Alexa Visarion has emerged of late as a writer dedicated to the theatre, who seeks and arouses its energies through dense, concrete and sensual words. The thought of it is rooted, nourished by the unspoken matter of the language he explores with almost physical, erotic pleasures, for he commands words that reveal ideas, yet still charged with all their emotional load. This way what used to fascinate him on stage in his youthful years has been transferred to the book as its double. They have become inseparable: the book and the stage. Communicating vessels that have equivalent energies! I passionately read his pages and find pleasure in his meetings with the stage. Meetings swept over by an adumbration of the end and the melancholy of disappearance. This is what moved me seeing not only the Jesters’ Night, with the unforgettable Ilie Gheorghe - this being the last role as in Chekhov! – but also The Carnival, where over the admirable montage rose the shadow of a forgotten, but now found, Caragialesque character.

He detaches himself as a hero without a aura that changes the comic vision that we inherited from great shows and which in Alexa changes its tone: beyond laughter, masks and confusions, the prospect of death is drawn! Its horizon ...

In fifty years, Alexa Visarion, has displayed the same involvement, but he has moved from the effervescence of former times to the progressive current darkness ... and, if the shows are rarer, he finds in his words the most appropriate therapy. Living words that heal! And that encourage one! Alexa will not surrender! (George Banu)

The New Psychology of Money is an accessible and comprehensive analysis of our relationship with money in all its forms.

Comprehensive and profound, Adrian Furnham explores the role that money plays in a variety of contexts, from family to outdoor life, and wonders if the relationship is always a healthy one. Discussing how money influences what we think, what we say and how we behave in a number of situations, the book places the dynamics of financial culture and credit cards in the context of traditional attitudes to wealth across a wide range of cultures, also analyzing how the concept of money has developed throughout history.

The book poses several questions:

- Understanding money: What are our concerns about money and how are nationality, history and religion modulating these attitudes?
- Money at home: How do we grow with money and what role do they play in the family? What role does gender play and how is it possible to lose control over money?
- Money in the workplace: Are we really motivated by money in the workplace? And what methods do traders use to convince us to give up on our money?
- Money in everyday life: How can we balance the need to earn more money through investments with the desire to make charitable donations or to give money to friends and family? How has the evolution of our relationship with money changed?

If it rains and you have a pop-up umbrella, when you open it suddenly you can wake up in other realms. That’s how I woke up with my umbrella, like Mary Poppins, as far as Stonehenge! It's good to pay more attention to objects. Be careful with them because they are capable of retaliation. When you hear that someone’s flower pot has fallen on their heads, you should know that there can be many interpretations that pertain to the world of symbols. If the pot has flowers, it can be a good sign, but it also depends on the colour of the flowers. If the flowers are white, it is a sign of peace and quiet, if they are red, it means blood and you can expect a tragedy. If they are purple, that means hallucinations. But if the flowers are decayed, go home quickly, lock the door and urgently call a cardiologist.

Objects can make fun of you, after studying your weak points. They can communicate with each other with the help of mirrors or reflections from the windows. Ask, please, a seamstress where her pin pad or scissors have disappeared and wherefrom do they reappear on the same day and in the same place! A writer can tell you how his pen vanished from his fingers or how letters from his typewriter disappeared, or entire pages of his new novel!

I read that an installer came upon his toolkit while crossing a motorway! A wardrobe took advantage of its master’s departure to a resort to get some rest and ran away from home! He crossed National Road 1 and, by accident or ignorance, collided with a Turkish TIR loaded with sheep. The wardrobe overturned, and the sheep ran into the woods where they attacked deer and even wild boars! The wardrobe, slightly damaged, fled from the scene! Police sent out chasing parties with trained dogs and, with the help of citizens, hope to spot out the wardrobe and immobilize it.
And, on top of everything, while the experience of writing was limited to scenarios for my own hypothetical films and essays in magazines and newspapers, when I started to draw characters for the new film, which will never be produced, my pen started, of its own accord, instead of drawing, to write the stories you are reading now! I did nothing but obey its will! (Mihai Șurubaru)

The motor force of the Romanian society’s modernization was the recovery of the feeling of dignity. Modernization meant, for Alecu Russo and other patriots of his generation, the straightening of their spine, the cessation of bribes, of wearing shalwars, which unlike trousers, allowed bows without the risk of damaging the stitching of the seams. From a cultural point of view, modernization as verticalization meant the historiographical recovery of the Romanian past and the creation of a system of symbolic economy, organically linking the popular culture with that of the national elites. Heralded by many cultural projects, beginning with those of Ion Heliade Rădulescu, Gheorghe Asachi, Mihail Kogălniceanu or Alecu Hurmuzachi, this program was the brightest one launched by the Junimea and Convorbiri literare societies. From a political point of view, the type of modernization for which Alecu Russo and his generation fought, presupposed, in Ion C. Brătianu’s formulaic statement, personal freedom through national independence. From an economic point of view, the modernization of Romania presupposed the development of the Romanian economy by adopting an economic program that harmoniously combined economic protectionism necessary for the development of the national industries with the domestic economy of the small free market. (Mircea Platon)

The brilliant plea of writer and historian Mircea Platno for the reconstruction of national dignity is a history lesson whose purpose is to revive the roots of the national tradition and to return to the founding models of modern Romania. In other words, the correct reading of history undertaken by a scholar, for whom erudition, verticality and honesty are inborn qualities, offers us the necessary solutions to overcome an apparently insurmountable impasse. As long as you possess the dignity of your own roots, problems turn into situations which provide their own solutions. If correctly read, history offers answers to all your questions. Or, almost.
By reviving the editorial with the help of literature, Dragoș Bako’s book is entering a plea against cultural and behavioral standardization, a panacea for improving cognitive dissonance and cultural liberation of citizens from the levelling tyranny of the «global brain», for ceasing to be manipulated by the media. Otherwise, our freedom of choice, our free will, even our personality, remain mere illusions which, like soap bubbles, disappear at the first confrontation with the memes that the mass media constantly inoculate. Convinced that, at present, we live an intensely mediated (obviously viral) life, the author emphasizes the decisive role of the editorial in the creation of cultural antidotes, able to protect us from the influence of the standardizing memes that mass media inoculate in us while parading as as the fourth power. (Prof. Dr. Gheorghe Manolache)

In How to Turn Your Husband into a Millionaire, Larisa Renar argues in favour of her belief that money is a directed, structured, sexual and vital energy. Woman gives her man her energy and he turns it into money, so that the man’s income is largely influenced by the woman next to him. It depends on the woman whether he will be „the leader of the village” or if his name becomes known worldwide.

Female energy exists in a pure state. To capitalize on it, we must know how to set goals, trust ourselves, love each other and love what we do, have a will and be determined. Thus, we follow our guiding star, we take power and we are in communion with ourselves, and then it becomes easier. There are people who are ready to support us, believe in our ideas, and the Universe gives us money to reveal our potential. In addition, the greater the woman’s energy, the more possibilities can she offer to man.
This book will be useful to everyone, including women who are not in a relationship, because it teaches us how to change the financial side of our lives for good.

Using simple techniques to increase energy, life is filled with abundance! The recommended methods show us how to turn the talent we have and our favorite occupation into winning, but also how to inspire and support our beloved man in his career.

They are, as I said, complementary to the four unitary enterprises dedicated to the same field. Those ones take priority. This volume aims only to help those who are still or again eager to have one more look at a great culture of the world.

Utility is despised by many intellectuals. They always crave for genius. Tolstoy’s genius wanted to be useful. Personally, I always like to comply with his call.” (Ion Ianoşi)

The more you are not in the category of adventurous people, the more this book will help you. The art of survival is a complex guide on how you can stay alive in the middle of the wild using knowledge about nature and techniques passed down from generation to generation. You will probably never need it, but what if it happens?

In a hostile environment you need to know what and wherefrom to take everything that may be useful to you to get home again. You must orient yourself in an unknown place, seek food, water, shelter, make fire, know how to attract the attention of potential rescuers.

But before you know how to escape alive you really need to want this, because there are many things that can demoralize you: the cold, the wind, the rain, the ruthless sun, the lack of water, food, loneliness ... Only those who adapt themselves on the go to vicissitudes will survive. Intelligence, psychic resilience and strength are the main weapons in the fight against the elements in all climatic zones, be it the frozen north, the equatorial jungle, the Australian, African or South American desert or the urban jungle of the present.

The author provides the reader with synthesized information, supplemented with illustrations, so that they can be easily understood and applied by ordinary people, without special training. Nor does he omit the psychological issue, giving guidance on stress management techniques, maintaining motivation and a positive attitude in extreme situations.

The younger people are, the hotter their blood is. If you touch them, you feel their bodies burn. When their fever can no longer be controlled, they feel pain, and then they must be released by jumping, crying and stirring up trouble. These women are like the old astral constellations, there is nothing in the village that they have no idea about. With just a snap of their fingers, they can list several dozen easy-going people. These were of all varieties, both men and women. Some of them are dead, others still live a prosperous life and at lunchtime they go out in front of the door sitting on stools in the sun. As people get older, their feelings of shame also decline and they no longer bother to keep their secrets hidden.

It seems that ever since I can remember, yet, more precisely since about the age of I have kept - with some interruptions - an intimate journal. At different times, it took different forms: now simple notes about events, daily experiences, or reading notes, then repertoire of spiritual exercises, records of meditations following an itinerarium mentis in Deum, or, at other times of obsessive passion, most often a melting pot containing reflections, notes on books, events of the world, letters, travel notes, projections into the imaginary, dreams, fictions. At certain times I wrote even two “journals”, one for recording reflections, another for tracking the development of an intimidating intimate experience. Rarely do the texts exceed the limits of the “daily” note, growing into essays written for days, if not weeks in a row.

Entire notebooks, numerous sheets of these intimate archives have been scattered, lost among the wrecks of the last decades in houses searched, abandoned, confiscated, passed into the “state patrimony”. Others, still numerous, were found in boxes and bags, stranded - if not on deserted beaches – in the garages and warehouses of friends or relatives. A few arrived, brought or illegally taken across borders, during the period when I myself, a political refugee in France, could not return to the country. Among them, this “Blue book”.

Thomas Mann wrote on the centenary of Tolstoi’s birth: “In him, man was stronger than the artist and doubtless stronger than the thinker.” This judgment, in three steps, would be the most appropriate motto for the Diary. However, the introduction to the Diary will have to be satisfied with less. Without losing sight of the artist-man, it will have to go down to the thinker’s lab. This is because problems are the most problematic part of Tolstoy’s creation. And also because some still opine that the artist and man could be detached from the thinker. You can believe in Tolstoy’s relative superiority over ideas, or, more precisely, over some of his too explicit ideas. However, you cannot fail to recognize their overall organic osmosis. The thinker, the artist and the man finally make up an indivisible trinity.

Consequently, I will isolate Tolstoy’s thoughts from the rest, only and only so that the reader will not isolate the rest of them. And not to isolate from one another the stages of the same creation - according to the prejudice, stemming from the previous one and completing it, according to which at first the artist would have prevailed, bringing us satisfaction, and only afterwards would the thinker have prevailed filling us with dissatisfaction. Appearances favour such a division; all the more so since the six decades of creation are really divided into two equal periods of thirty years each. (...)

The genius personality cannot fail to impress a sublimated unity upon all his concurrent and successive activities. The reader of Tolsoty’s Diary will easily notice this.

Li Er is a Chinese author who has called attention upon himself through his innovative fiction. The Cherry in the Pomegranate Tree is the story of life in a village in the Henan province, an unfamiliar world to us. With humour and sincerity, Li Er describes the conflict between tradition and modernity, backwardness and progress, the Chinese way of life and Western influences. The lives of people in rural China are portrayed in all their tragicomic aspects through subtle irony and yet in a sensitive way, which tames the satirical onslaught.
Young Kong Fanhua is the mayor of the village. It is several weeks ahead of the new elections, and Fanhua wants to be re-elected. For this, she needs to distinguish herself in the election campaign against her male colleagues. At the heart of the story lies the issue of birth control. In China, maximum two births per family are allowed. However, a woman is pregnant for the third time and refuses to abort. According to the party policy, the success of observing the birth rate in the village measures the capacity of the village head. Fanhua involves the whole village in finding the woman, so we get to know different characters, the potential conflicts between them, their vulnerable points and ambitions, all in a funny language.

It is a village observed in the context of postmodernism, in a process of continuous transformation. It brings together various challenging ideas that enforce each other. I opted for a method which allowed me to express my own vision and understanding of things and, of course, my puzzles. Readers who know the history of literature may notice that it is a novel totally different from any other rural novel. My attitude as a writer is not subjective, but as realistic as possible.

Leonardo da Vinci wrote in 1500 that the time will come when the killing of an animal will be as severely condemned as the killing of a man. Tolstoy wrote that “if slaughterhouses had glass walls, no one would eat meat anymore.” And the great genius and laureate of the Nobel Prize, Dr. Albert Schweitzer, wrote that respect for life is the fundamental ethical principle of Christianity, because the ethics of love is the universal and permanent content of the Christian message! Because life is sacred and indivisible, one and the same in its substance, regardless of form, we cannot grant or deny to a being the right to existence according to the form in which it is presented. The dragon awakens from a long numbness, opens one eye, then the other, shakes his scales of dust, raises his head, breathes out steam through his large, dilated nostrils, flames burst from the open mouth, leaving a sharp line of teeth, his strong tail thrashes the air, and he thus appears to the whole world, who looks at him with admiration and astonishment, though some are afraid.
In the new historical conditions and on the basis of the constitutional provisions, special laws ensured in the period after 1918 the legislative, monetary, financial unification, that of communications and transport, education, social insurance, social assistance, national defense and of other fields. These major changes in the destinies of the unitary national state were realized in the first ten years after the Union, a period characterized, with justifications, as a decisive decade in the development of the inter-war Romanian society, of modern Romania in general. At the same time, internationally, the Romanian state affirmed itself as an active force in the general effort of the peoples for the defense of global peace, of the national borders established by the peace treaties signed at the Paris Peace Conference.

The multiple mutations that took place in the Romanian society in the interval between 1918-1928, with important consequences in all fields of activity, show the importance of these sequences of history in retrospect and looking ahead at the evolution of the Romanian people.

Rarely did the motif of “the world as a dream” receive such an extensive, nuanced and diverse orchestration in world literature. Adam is dreaming of himself, dreaming of others at the same time. Dreams derive from each other, and waking moments are only pretexts for entering other reverie states. The epic scenarios of dreams, as well as of nightmares, are enveloped in a state of delirium, when words reach their maximum potential. Word fiction creates new worlds that disappear through other modulations of dream words.

Experience shapes us. But it also deforms us. Coming out of a negative experience, with an unfortunate end, we are marked for the rest of our lives. Let’s take a closer look. Experience, positive or negative, has two possible origins: from within us or from the outside. If it is positive, we congratulate ourselves and consider it our work. But if it is negative, we always - or almost always - blame others, others. In addition, when the experience is positive, we want to repeat it, in the hope of getting the same results, which can bring us the same satisfaction. Remember what the wisdom of the people tell us: “The pitcher will not too often go to the well.” When the experience is negative, we forget that we have got into it ourselves, hoping for benefits and positive results. It is clear that without life experiences we cannot live.

The history of modern Romania is – in the backdrop of the two millennia which has passed since the origin of the Romanian people - synonymous with the exit of Romanians from the medieval world through the general ideals of building the Romanian nation and the national state in the context of the European model. Modernity, however, was built on the accumulations of the past, on the general human (of Europe and of the world) and local (Romanian) experience. The frontranking intellectuals of the Romanian people - among whom the most valuable - realized, more intensely from the seventeenth century onward, that Romanians have both western and eastern European roots. On the one hand, by their Roman origin, Romance language, Christian faith and by their name, Romanians originate in Rome, that is, in the West, while, on the other hand, through the church organization according to the Byzantine model, as well as through the Slavonic language of the religious rites, chancellery and medieval culture, and through the Cyrillic alphabet, they are affiliated with New Rome (Constantinople), and the Byzantine Slavic heritage, that is, with the East. This strange duality made the Romanians - the only legitimate heirs of Eastern Romanity - a sui generis reality, praised by some, blacked by others and placed where the two halves of Europe meet and interfere. Romania is unique to me, it is my homeland. It was here I saw the sunlight, I read in the moonlight, I suffered, I cried and I was happy. Here did I discover my vocation, I achieved success or failure, I met people of moral and professional distinction, generous and worthy, who have been my models and to whom I remain forever grateful. Here I learned in good schools, with teachers dedicated to their mission and listened to great professors, brilliant personalities of the Romanian people, in no way inferior to European standards and values. Here did I identify the great founders of Romanian culture, civilization and science. Here I discovered the breadth and dedication of great statesmen, huge personalities of Romanian politics, pillars of the nation and founders of the modern Romanian state. Here did I identify great personalities from other ethnic groups, whether Jews, French, Armenians, Germans, etc., who put their destiny in the service of Romanians, some of them giving their all. Here, on this earth, are those wonderful people, anonymous, faithful to the profound Romania, unaltered by times. Here I was born and here I will remain, in the eternity of the Romanian soil. Here are some of the 100 reasons that built my unalterable faith in my homeland, Romania. “ (Victor Voicu)

“Victor Voicu impressed me by this characteristic phlegmatism, on which he himself could say a lot, irrespective of the sacrifices, losses and supreme efforts that it cost him. That is because we know now, at a certain age and with a certain experience, that everything costs, although the losses and suffering, the wounds inflicted by this payment, by this offering, cannot be equated in any other form or currency. Beyond our distinct, unmistakeable traits, there were some qualities which drew us together. First of all, perhaps, what we call serious biographical or destiny finality, that is, that norm that in our youth we discovered and then we assumed with firm energy and will: the service of an Idea! In his case, the faith in Hippocrates and his oath, as if he were laid on an altar; yes, an altar, of course! “ (Nicolae Breban)

A suicide which took place in the first part of the previous century, a crime which takes place a century later, that is, nowadays, and the shape, vaguely outlined in the mud on the bottom of Lago Maggiore, of a vintage car, which sank seventy five years ago, and which, at the end, when it was brought to the surface, proved to be a surprisingly well-preserved and very precious Bugatti Brescia 22. What is the connection between these seemingly disparate events occurring at such a long distance from each other? May Destiny have worked at the bottom of everything, as this author seems to suggest? Or is this just the story, so troubled and dramatic, of Ettore Bugatti’s family - one of the greatest car builders of all time?

Let the reader have the pleasure of discovering the answer himself. The tone, now elegiac, then the objective, alert variety of a detective novel, now realistic, the play of perspectives render this novel based on real events an exciting reading. It has been received with enthusiastic reviews in all the important publications in Germany and Switzerland.

Masters of persuasion know what they need to do to convince us. Those who manipulate use natural, natural inclinations of our psyche to their own advantage.

But it is not only they who use these principles. We all use them and we fall victim to them at the same time as we interact with our neighbors, friends and family. But masters of persuasion have something more at their disposal than us, who possess a superficial understanding.

Robert Cialdini teaches us how to recognize manipulation and how to avoid it. But be careful! Not every action is manipulative. We must still trust people.

Although there are thousands of persuasion modalities that professionals can use, most are limited to six basic categories. Each is governed by a fundamental psychological principle, which dictates behavior and which gives it the power of action. These ones - reciprocity, consistency, verification, connection, authority and restraint - are presented, taking into account the function they play within society and the weight that a professional in the field can make use of in the purchase, donation, assignment, applications for vote or agreement.

Doctor Robert B. Cialdini teaches university and postgraduate courses on persuasion and social influence at the University of North Carolina and Columbia University. He is currently the head of the psychology chair and member of the Board of Directors of Arizona State University.

I believe that the basis of society, as it has been said, began to deteriorate after World War II, when our country became a Soviet colony and a Kremlin-centred dictatorship was established, where children were forced to denounce their parents who listened to free Europe and to mourn Stalin’s death. Children were increasingly detaching themselves from a family weakened by society. Children were taught that the future depended solely on them, their parents being bound to their outdated past.

“– Hey, are you blaming only kids? What about their parents?”

You are right! Parents would reach the middle of their lives terrified at the prospect of their old age. Hoping that they could delay it, they neglected their family wishing to live a new youth: with lovers / lovers, sleepless nights and the selfishness that characterizes today’s society. This is what the French call le démon de midi, midi being the middle of life.

“So young people are scared of adulthood, and old parents of aging!”

“Exactly!”

The image of the hourglass ("the hourglass sister", to quote a poet of the Romanian Academy Library), despite its banality, lends itself to all kinds of interpretations. If it represents the life of a man, then the sand that has not yet been spilled measures the time you have left, with the assumption that the sand leaks out constantly, as does the time it measures. Who turns the hourglass is not known, but once turned, the leak can no longer be stopped. But gradually your concern is over, Your Sorge, as Heidegger said, and you can’t take your eyes off the hourglass. Spengler said that every nation has its own hourglass. Watch out for the sand! Especially when it is gold.

And if you look at the overturned hourglass of Oriental Romanity or Latinity, as they say, you are seized with pure horror (Sorge being a kind of joke). For the romance peoples stretch from the North of the Carpathian Mountains to the Peloponnes and from the North of the Black Sea to the Adriatic Sea. “Someone” turned its hourglass at the barbarian invasion, and the sand has been pouring forth until today when there are only a few strands left through the Balkans along with Romania’s golden sand. But Romania too is losing parts of its territory: some are taken away and others given to its neighbors. It may not be the case yet, but some Sorge should still be experienced.

I had not intended to write on this subject, but circumstances, especially the public readings in this volume, have succeeded in putting this concern of mine to the test. And I’ve been looking for all kinds of solutions.

Well-written and with a strange, original subject, in contrast to what Sorin Lavric has published so far, this book amazes the reader through the unusual mix of conceptualizations as abstract and evocative as possible in the area of erotic passion. I identify in its pages, ever if well disguised, a misogyny existing in most philosophers, here as a result of the cold gaze of the one who once attended the medical dissection room. This time it is femininity that gets under the scalpel, perennial, as it is, or fallen into the ephemeral. Literary fiction is relied on to illustrate the typologies that the author imparts on the hypocrite lecteur.

Din câte îmi pot da seama, cunoscându-l de mult timp, Sorin Lavric imaginează tipologiile feminine precum altădată Rubens picta aceeaşi voluptuoasă femeie văzută din unghiuri diferite, multiplicând-o de parcă ar fi fost tot alta; sau precum Maillol o modela în marmoră sau bronz exclusiv pe Dina, modelul său plastic și apoi soție, ilustrând astfel figuri simbolice: fluviul, muntele, marea, ba chiar prin siluete robuste și Ars Amandi a lui Ovidiu.” Ion Papuc

As far as I can tell, having known him for a long time, Sorin Lavric imagines feminine typologies as once Rubens painted the same voluptuous woman seen from different angles, multiplying her as if she had been something else; or like Maillol casting in marble or bronze exclusively Dina - his plastic model and then his wife -, serving symbolic figures: the river, the mountain, the sea, even robust silhouettes and Ovid’s Ars Amandi.” (Ion Papuc)

Bright burn the eyes of grass,
the eyes of the moon light up.
Falling pods on the flatbed,
on this holy afternoon

and in my pagan spirit,
sucked in from black and dirty seas,
gently swaying in your palm
and baptized in bitter rain.

Enlighten me, carry me up
among your lame angels,
pillars supporting at the gate
myopic heavens and demons.

Wash away my heathen heart,
in storms and tornadoes;
light up the corners
until nightfall

and emptiness brings it to you, and tear it off, and in the walls
he builds around, closes it in.
You annoint her eyes with honey

And at dawn you snatch it from there,
you caress and spoil her
bringing her honey-dew
collected from forefathers ...

Aura Christi’s Genius of the Heart is an exquisite dialogue between man and divinity, heaven and earth. Through her insightful vision, brilliant ideas, sentimental delicacy and tense, powerful idiom, the poet reveals to us a pure, candid and living soul, which, in a contemporary world with sundry commitments, daily conflicts and anxiety, soothes our hearts like a summer breeze, a light in darkness and a fiery rebirth in the frosts of winter.” Ding Chao (China)

“It is difficult to find a poet or philosopher capable to enthrall your senses, your soul, to leave a profound mark on your way of looking at the world. Through its complex simplicity, which is the form of infinite inner resources, Aura Christi leads the reader into the interstices of being. Crucial to the poetry of Aura Christi are the eyes, the source of life, the stone on which everything is built. In the act of seeing Aura finds the whole mystique of being, which sees and dreams the vortex of the planets from the heights to the abyss of the beginning, when everything was invented «from the Eyes». So everything is based on the action of seeing, including the possibility of knowing, but it is not an Apollonian or Platonic view, but rather a view of what emerges from darkness, a capacity of knowledge that does not want to understand, to exorcise suffering, considering it the matrix of the being. Aura spells out philosophy when she writes poetry, she spells out poetry when she does philosophy, and she does so because, in this hermeneutic circle, she finds her own life.” Francesco Corsi (Italia)

All peoples are concerned about their identity, but, with the Romanians, this issue has assumed special forms. The Romanians, inhabitants up to the modern age of two autonomous principalities, subjected to the Ottoman Gate, coveted by many other neighbors but living in the vast provinces occupied by the Hungarians, Austrians, Russians and Turks, lost among so many rapacious foreigners, were asked, even more than others, where they had come from and who they were. Eventually, however, all small peoples, struck by fate and left at the mercy of the great, have such concerns, sometimes transformed into true obsessions. (Ioan-Aurel POP)

It’s the kind of writing you'll be leafing through, and after reading it, you’ll just remember the foamy, humorous dialogues of the characters. It is that kind of book that matcheds perfectly rainy days, with clouds, when you are without energy, because it will put you in a good mood, making you smile. (Adriana Alexandra)

The absurd remains the distinguishing mark of this piece of fiction, but in the Kafkian key now, ie grim and (self-) incriminating. Sentences are sparsely distributed. The intention is to create an atmosphere with the help of intelligent and efficient writing, without the baroque and rhetorical-cultural excesses that usually appeal to us, the Balkan South Americans. (Felix Nicolau)

In conclusion, a kind of absurd based mainly on inadequacy and highlighting psychological perversions. But there is also a clear suggestion of widespread stupidity. Authentic absurdity governs tangled, impossible situations, but which does not discourage future victims. Ioan Suciu is an extremist absurdist who pushes the weirds into ridicule. But even the times no longer allow finesse, subtlety. (Felix Nicolau)

Following a unique direction to a destination which is one of a kind, Ioan Suciu manages the performance of detaching himself from the classic patterns, clearing the narrative of the factors that keep it anchored by the classic landmarks of humor. (Marius Gabor)

O thought, you earth of air,
you breath of the lost god,
in mornings of falling dew,
sickness brought us from the east,
out of doubt, sleep, forgetfulness

or who knows how from a well, which you went through without knowing -
unobstructed, unmoved island in the lagoons of late, outgoing love in a way of being entertained out of the way, when it’s too late to run, to hope, to be, not to be in their core of fire, in which you are alive,

I’m alive, as one is in a tornado.
We don’t know where I come from, where you come from.
You love, I love. We are trapped in crazy madness. A tornado is sweeping us to heaven. We slide from one limit to another. High above a rock in a wink of the eye threatens upon us to fall.

“Aura Christi’s poetry explores the “subterraneous inwardness” in an atmosphere charged with mystery, emotion and magical phrases, such as “painting lightning at dusk”. For Christi, “the heart knows everything”, and the “magic” of the poet wrapped “in the living, slow light”, takes one “on its great wing, striving” to reach the place where you “remain eye to eye with God”. Here is some poetry of great lyrical force and overflowing imagination!” (Adam J. Sorkin)

“Here comes forth, out of words of the Aura Christi words, flowing abundantly, from hidden sources, the invigorating fluid of poetry; let us not fear the rhetoric of capital letters, and simply speak of Great Poetry.” (Nicolae Balotă - France)

“Great literature is born out of the desire to explore the unknown beyond its perceptible limits, to get as close as possible to that supreme reality unsupported by rational concepts or by empirical investigation. Some poets, such as Aura Christi, have a name for this mysterious Reality - “God”, which they rebuild according to the dictates of intuition and imagination, coming up with their own version of divinity. It is to this instance which is some divinity in the beginning, before being God Himself, that Aura Christi addresses her confession without reserve, imparting on Him her apprehensions, despair and hopes, asking for advice. God seems to answer them and from this dialogue is born a poem capable of confronting the twenty-first-century intelligence which is increasingly pragmatic, increasingly sceptical and culturally impoverished.” (Petru Iamandi - mkRomania)

“I’ve been trying to express the mystical unity of being - also at fifty years of age - both in the Genius of the Heart and in the third part of the other novel in verses, a novel-psalm entitled the Island of Resurrection. This third part is subtitled “Through the Eyes of Adam, through Eve’s Eyes”. The ascent to this peak I undertook as if I had been climbing a mountain plateau on the monotonous surface, hard to reach, extremely dangerous, full of traps hidden to the eye; it was as if I was going through a deep abyss, perceived as hell transformed, from time to time, into heaven; it was incredible, and so it is true that I could not stop singing anymore, as I plunged deeper and deeper into myself, denying the impulse that forced me to stop the song tossed on paper out of the need to free myself from an intensity that made me feel how my lungs were dislocated, how my whole being was burning in the core of that vortex, that tornado of grace. A mountain plateau, then. A miraculous plateau. A wonderful peak. Shall I call it Fujiyama, the Roof of the World or the Peak of Man?

How can I thank for such an experience, which almost killed me but without which I would not have been myself? Undoubtedly beauty possesses an unbelievable greed, endowed with the power to kill. Salvation is a chance for the few. The elected among the elect. “ (Aura Christi)
I’m thinking of an article about Hogas. Hogaş simply tortures me. It’s so curious he died! People are missing him so much! It feel as if I’d like to tell him something but that’s no longer possible. I never felt anything like this about a dead man. Probably because he had so much life, he was life itself. And it was Moldavia, and the past, and the mountains, and the monasteries - which are not anymore. He died symbolically! “(Garabet Ibraileanu to George Topirceanu, 1918)

This new book about Eminescu was born out of a core study, published in 2012 in the Romanian Language Journal in Chisinau, occasioned by the commemoration of two centuries since the occupation of Bessarabia by the Russian Empire in 1812. Upon rereading, the number of pages multiplied so that the study was extended to the present book, becoming the eighth of the twelve dedicated to the Eminescu phenomenon, from 1984 until today. The second edition has substantially added to the one in 2013, including not less than five new chapters: ”Historiographic Appendix to the <Stere case>”, ”Ontological Encounter: Eminescu and Stere”, ”Bessarabia and the Romanian Archetype”, ”Identitarian Resurrection of Bessarabia”, ”Time and Exile”. Of course, attention is focused on Eminescu’s vision of the destiny of this Romanian province, a vision that combines, with a penchant worthy of a brilliant mind, the historiographical elements with those of philosophy, law, politics, morality, all in close correlation with what we had called, in an earlier book, the archetypal ontology. However, the title of Eminescu’s Bessarabia has forced me to go beyond the strictly exegetical reference, following the spirit of Eminescu’s approach to the subsequent destiny of the province, which is impossible to break apart from that of post-Eminescu Romania. This book contains his famous poems The Way of Refuge, Life at Wansongpu, About Hunger, The Return Journey, The Forest of Pines and others. Zhang Wei’s poetry grows out of the geographic background of his own life, expressing the complex history and unique culture of this earth, the experience of childhood, the story of his clan, the emotion of returning to his native village, revealing in words and inbetween lines his love for the majestic rivers among the high mountains, and for all fellow human beings. The long poem The Haven of Refuge, through the theme of the “refuge”, describes a traveller wandering in the magical and rustic charm of the earth in good faith for the past and present lives lived on that earth, while questioning the origin of life, the value of man, and the fate of mankind, over which it is worth meditating.

“The novel is captivating, well written, despite some rhetorical effusions that could be shortened. On the other hand, it is a text written by a scholar, with readings from Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, Jung or Dostoevsky, made in depth, thoroughly. Consequently, it is a novel in which symbols appear all the way, embedded in the text, in the technique of a hermeneutical modernism that cannot be removed from the equation (...).

Strictly technical, we find ourselves in front of a Bildungsroman built on a classic initiation scenario: Young Matthew (all names are taken from the Bible ...) experiences the tearful, dramatic death of his father, David, lost in a car accident in the Olt Valley. He is in open conflict with his mother, Riri, a pragmatic woman, but going through a period of emotional barenness, hidden under the mask of a nervous disposition. In compensation, Matthew focuses his entire affection on his grandfather Grig, also dead by the end of the novel, and on professor Semion Ruda - stylish, elevated, aristocratic, a provisional same-city-dweller and a “surrogate father”, to whom the novel’s protagonist ultimately owes his intellectual revival - a future student in philosophy - and literary training, as a novelist, the compensatory talent of writing, being discovered without premeditation or exhortation from the outside, instead, just as a welling up of his inner turmoil. “(Ștefan Borbély)

A complex, “marked out” personality (according to modern cultural psychometry), Aura Christi is, among contemporary writers, a genuine “canonical singularity” in point of artistic individuality, so that at the national level she serves that unity in diversity to which philosopher Mircea Vulcănescu aspired after the Great Union, a historical event that gathered within the new political borders the peculiarities of the Romanian provinces that had united for the first time in a single national state. (...) Whoever reads Aurea Christi’s books, from poetry and fiction to essayism and journalism, cannot fail to notice that her Virgilian guides are Dostoevsky, Nietzsche and Eminescu, the last in the series giving her national consciousness and a profound, musical reception of the world, not so much by hearing, as by looking as ontological essence: in the beginning was the eye is the creed of her genesis.” (Theodor Codreanu)

The idea of the necessity to approach the issue of reading theory was still quite unclear to me when I finished a brief review of some of the theories considered to be “the sources of the modern methodological adventure”. Subsequently, expanding the insight into sociology, imaginary theory, aesthetics of reception, principles of counterfactual history, and theory of communication (some also addressed in a university course curriculum), the theory of reading theory became clearer, concomitantly with the necessity to comment on the “cultural status” of several literary works in the Romanian canon. And a final apostille: Our glossing will not teach anyone what, how and why to read; but perhaps a copy will get to some person in high office making him understand that without a humanist education from the first stage of schooling and without the creation of a wide cultural climate marked by the sense of the quality of intellectual life, the extinction of the “acculturated man” will lead us directly to posthistory synonymous with prehistory.” (Mircea Braga)

This is a modern interpretation of the Biblical parable of Onan’s sin, the man who avoided procreation through a deviant sexual act - a practice rejected by those with strong religious beliefs. The protagonist of the novel is the prototype of the teenager who goes through the first erotic experiences. The timidity in establishing first relationships, as well as the excess of imagination, instead of normal sexual intercourse, creates a state of inhibition and depression, also amplified by occasional failed experiences. Normality comes with the knowledge of a woman who unconditionally gives her love. Instead, her desire to have a child out of formal wedlock alarms and depresses him. Educated in a family with a dogmatic understanding of the notion of “morality” – his father, a priest, his mother, a police employee - the youth oscillates between his father’s belief – it is God who decides the birth of a child, not man - and of his mother – marriage out of wedlock is unacceptable. Finally, in order to avoid a child from an unlawful connection, the young man ignores Christian morality and resorts to the practices by which the mythical Onan became “the unforgivable sinner” in the Biblical version. In this way, the protagonist becomes an archetype of romantic failure born of a “consciousness” still marked by tribal prejudices.

Only later did I understand that I practiced what, inspired by him, I called the “nostalgia about value.” Because Alexa Visarion, with his rigours and principles, with his effusions and remoteness, his uncommonly intense way of thinking, living and practicing art, embodies the classic model of the authentic intellectual. Hence a loneliness that accompanies him everywhere ... The present book reads like an old and mysterious treatise on something very precious that unfortunately has become increasingly unclear to us. It is an anxious book, because, speaking of facts and real people, it also announces the danger of absence, of unrepeatability. It gives the reader the joy of revelations, but also the feeling of indefinable losses, operating subtly, elegantly, volatile, with two fundamental categories of the human: Nostalgia and Value. It’s an islandish book that can save you from wreckage in the derision of the present ...”

a writer alike). I confess that the four-part model suited me, as did the relatively limited number of words, as well as that intentional dimension reminding me of a parable. I believe that in this twenty-first century there is no longer time for lengthy narratives: the time of the universe seems to be speeding up, and ours, of mortals, seems to be shrinking. And if the parables in the volume entitled Guides for the Soul were European, and those of the Last Giant of Zarand I called Transylvanian, those in this cycle (the final one) I simply consider them existential, with a significantly experiential component. I intended to include as much as possible in as few words as possible and as easily as possible, finally finding out (not without satisfaction) that, beyond their slightly fantastic dimension, these stories also have the consistency of poems “. Tainele seducţiei ediţia a II-a – Larisa Renar. The Secrets of Seduction. Second Edition

Women’s bio-energetic practices are presented for the first time in an interesting form and an impressibly efficient system. Larisa Renar introduces you to a world where energy elements and flows are no less important than the exchange rate; the elements are not simply added to create a relationship, but they are built harmoniously in accordance with the laws of psychology and the legends that suddenly make sense in real life.

The Magic of Women Power describes the initial journey of two women who lived in different epochs. They discover the ancient laws of love and learn the secrets of seduction. Some women have the power to lead their lives onto the desired path and to attract the men they want, while others, regardless of their beauty, intelligence, education, youth, go unnoticed. For hundreds of years, women have sought and transmitted the secret techniques on how to keep and strengthen their feminine energy, and the ones who had that science and could use this energy possessed a colossal power. Some of this energy is given from birth, and others need years of practice to reach that level.

In his wife, a man wants to see everything - a passionate mistress, a muse to inspire him or an inaccessible queen, and an enthusiastic little girl, and a diligent housewife. A man expects, sometimes even unconsciously, the satisfaction of all his needs - mental, emotional, physical and sexual. He dreams to find all in one woman – all at once: mistress, and housewife, and queen, and child. These are the four manifestations of feminine energy, the four basic states of a woman. It is precisely this energy that attracts a man, for, without it, it is impossible for him to fulfil his dreams, realize his plans, make money and get power.
Everything around a woman is created only by her, through her energy. If you do not know how to regenerate your energy, you can lose it and then a man will try to find another source. Getting energy through sex, men unconsciously want that woman whom they feel to be strong. If you are powerless, then it is not important if you are young, rich or beautiful. You are desolate, and therefore no man will want you. For the man to observe you, you have to attract him through all his senses, to conquer him entirely - with his smile, his gaze, his embrace, smell, and taste. Get him hot. But in order to put a man on fire, you yourself must burn like a flame. When a woman burns like a fire, she sets everything around ablaze, and that light will draw a man towards her. This magic guide of feminine power teaches us how to build relationships, how to make a man fall in love with us, and not suffer from inevitable separation, using the energy of femininity and transforming ourselves from rough stone into diamond. Seeing the wonderful effects of these millenarian practices, you have every reason to experiment!

The “unlucky” syndrome affects people who do not trust themselves and do not love their own person. The first condition to get rid of this syndrome is to have an active life, because you will not have time to look at your failures.

For optimists, success is not something that happens to them, but something they can themselves build. Pessimists, on the contrary, are able to find misfortune even in the most abundant happiness.

You need to be aware that every man is making his fortune and is able to increase his chances of success. The most important thing is to want to find a solution to the problem and then move on to action. If you cannot change a situation, then change your attitude towards it!

The psychology of success is the antidote for your problems. Here you discover the path through which your behaviour changes through a series of exercises. You get help in dealing with stress, overweight, with alcohol, tobacco, depression, sociophobia, insomnia. At the same time, you will learn the magical formula for money, happiness, self-confidence and success.

If it seems to you that nothing in your life comes out all right, then this book is exactly what you have been looking for. It is a magical book, a “magic book” that can help you turn your failures into achievements.

Numerous studies have revealed that our lives are influenced by the subconscious. Our subconscious possesses the programme of transforming negative thoughts into positive ones. Often people set their brains to think in negative terms, making their existence more difficult. Using the magic word “But”, change your vision and look at things with humor (I have big ears, but I hear well!). If we consider someone else responsible for our happiness alone, we create additional difficulties. You do not need to wait for the moment when the reality around you will allow you to think about pleasant things, because that means you are living your life in perpetual expectancy. No one can decide for you what to think! The brain is a mechanism that works to accomplish a specific goal, and setting goals in the order of priorities is one of the most important moments on the road to success. A good tip to follow is to see the good side of things, even if it is made up of insignificant events in your life. The moment you meet with success, no matter how insignificant, make yourself a gift. And the moment you manage to concentrate your attention and energy on your chances of success, you will realize that life offers you plenty of opportunities.

“I am convinced that, mentally or manifest, Romanians, wherever they are, recognize the matrix, the six agreements out of which masterpieces are woven. And no matter what they be - a carpenter who beautifies houses, a technician playing with technical fireworks, or a builder who sweats striving to make his masonry strong, or a cook, waiter, caretaker, whose name is lost, everyone knows that a mountain will be a mountain, grass will be grass, the spring springs, and life is alive. The Romanians remaining in the country reach out their hands securely and firmly to the other Romanians, who, along unblemished paths, carry in their souls the red of the endless orchards, the deep yellow of the wheat harvest, and the undefiled blue of the sky. The third life lasted 25 years, living in the West, with freedom, dignity and achievements. Although I settled in France, I did not live in Paris, as my professional activity took place in Africa after my family arrived.
“ I have to admit that you’ve managed well.”
The Africa I have known is the one beyond the Sahara - the ocean of sand, as it is said - where we appreciated the hospitality, the respect for traditions and for elders, and the desire of everyone to live in the present, the modern era.

“Let’s not exaggerate.”
I know better, because that’s what I did in the over 20 years spent in the West African countries.

“With what results?”
Be patient! Neither did the West progress from one day to the next. Differences in the level of development among western countries have been perpetrated to the present day.

“What happened after the African experience?”
I have been living the fourth part of my life, the last one. It began before the end of its precedent, being however totally different. I have finally found my peace of heart, love and time. With them did I travel the whole world, the world past Europe and Africa. And I named this last part “autumn” – the season when fruits are harvested.

“Vivaldi again!”

Not long ago, an international debate took place in the aula magna of the Romanian Academy, in the center of which there was an “what if” history scenario: what will Europe be in fifty years? Of course, a prediction was launched setting out from a comparison between the geopolitical data of the present and those of fifty years ago, when our continent was divided into two ideological, economic, political and military blocks. In a hypothetic script which I exposed on that occasion, and which seems both verisimilous and appealing to me, the Europe of the future will once again be divided after this moment of illusory unity. Absolutely illusory, because Western Europe’s consumerist society and the Ideocratic Europe of the East are tangible realities every day in a community where the euro area is experiencing an unprecedented crisis - which goes as far as threats of exclusion of some countries - where the Schengen area becomes restrictive for seemingly well-founded reasons, and where Paul Valéry’s words seem to be ever more present for almost a century: “Europe is, in fact, a small peninsula of the Asian continent.” (Răzvan Theodorescu)
If you are telling me that you are no longer attracted by the fairy tales that delighted your childhood, I do not believe you! But if it is so nevertheless, it means you killed the child in you. The child, who has kept within us, no matter how old we were, laughter, crying, memory, creation, hate and especially love! Love for the one next to us as well as for the one we want to have next to us! Love for the children we brought into the world and especially for their children, on whom we have more time to spend. Love for friends, for the arts, for books, for travel, for a glass of old red wine.

This book is a fairy tale in which love is the main character. A hero that Silicon Valley geniuses want to dismantle and replace it with the latest creation of artificial intelligence, that is, the surrogate, lacking in feelings and beliefs. This book is one of the attempts to save lovers, for whom love is more important than anything in the world, and for which the emergence of robots to replace the male-female couple is unnecessary, unwanted, unacceptable. In conclusion, I invite you to read the fairy tale of this book and to live your love for your lovers.

Michael Argyle, The Psychology of Happiness
Psihologia fericirii

What is happiness? Why are some people happier than others?

This new edition of The Psychology of Happiness provides an easy-to-understand and up-to-date picture of the research on happiness. Since the publication of the first edition, in 1987, great progress has been made in this area; they are presented in this book for the first time, often with surprising conclusions. Setting out from research in sociology, physiology and economics, in addition to psychology, Michael Argyle explores the nature of positive and negative emotions, as well as the psychological and cognitive processes involved in their production. There is an accessible and very broad coverage of key terms: measuring and studying happiness; the effect of friendship, marriage, and other relationships on positive status; happiness, mental and physical health; the effects of labor, unemployment and leisure activities, the effects of money, social class and education. The book also analyzes the importance of individual personality traits, such as optimism, purpose in life, internal control and the right choice of objectives. New aspects of the topic are being discussed, such as national differences, the role of humour and the impact of religion. Are some countries happier than others? This is just one of the controversial issues raised by the author of the book. The Psychology of Happiness addresses the practical application of research in this field, such as how to increase happiness and its effects on health, altruism and sociability. This approach which spurs further reflection on the subject will be an extremely interesting reading for students and researchers, but also for the reader generally interested in this field.

„This new edition is an excellent updated synthesis of the research in what has been a very successful area of advance in social psychology, due in no small measure to Michael Argyle’s own work in the field.” – W. Peter Robinson, Professor of Social Psychology, University of Bristol.

„This book is bigger and better than the first edition. The author has definitely kept up with progress in the field and has summarised it well.” – Adrian Furnham, Professor of Psychology, University College London.

„Michael Argyle’s book gives an excellent broad overview of the scientific field of subjective well-being – the study of happiness, life satisfaction, and positive affect. Readers will discover many interesting, and even exciting, new facts about happiness. At the same time, this is not a difficult read... Argyle has done an outstanding job of introducing readers to an exciting new scientific field in the study of human behaviour.” – Ed Diener, Professor of Psychology, University of Illinois.

The second life lasted 30 years.
Quite a lot, keeping in mind their being lived under dictatorship.

“If only you had listened to me ...”
I haven’t been listening to you for quite a time, if you remember! Summin up, a life without youth, because I plunged from childhood directly into the world of the grown-ups. Being head of the family at seventeen is hard to imagine, but it was even more difficult to live through it.

“You most certainly asked for it!”
It wasn’t I who asked for it, but the other way round. The dreams of childhood got up in smoke and I had to think of something else.

“Other dreams?”
Correct! It was the future which looked for me to be its master, not destiny as the saying goes. For, as the old people say, you are the one who builds a destiny rather than the opposite.

“I must admit you’ve managed it!”
To a certain extent, because some of my dreams have not been put out. They’ve been stalking me like a secret shadow, and, to my amazement, they are still there.
Don’t spoil the readers’ delight, in case they find this reading pleasant.
"I told you!..."
I know, but I found this Terra attractive. I probably had pleasant memories of some past life.

“You could’ve changed the planet ... there are billions of them ....”
All right, that’s enough! You know I don’t like to look back into the past, regret it, and change my future accordingly. The past cannot be changed. Its memories, pleasant or not, remain unchanged, whatever we might do. Just put it on paper in the way of autobiographies or novels full of lies ...

“You and your long tales...”
- Exactly! Instead, the future stands in front of you, still unaltered, and you can turn it to new roads, hoping that your choices will bring you a living, bearable life! Destiny is ...

“You said that before! Change direction!”
When I was younger, I had no patience to listen to your nonsense. But now I’m listening ... I don’t know why.
“To find the wisdom you lack!“
That’s enough! I’m going back to my writings.
“To your lies!“
My dear, a French writer, said that a novel is a true story told by a liar!

The Philosophy of Romanina Identity

“Filosofia identității românești"

“A less inhibited approach to Romanian philosophy, in its historical evolution, I have always wanted, although I too am aware of what anyone knows, that such an enterprise is no longer possible but as a team product of decades of joint efforts. A history of philosophy, as a collective or, rarely, singular, work of the author’s diligence, is, anyway, a referential task in the history of any culture, a temptation and a sign of spiritual maturity in the evolution... of any community. Such individual undertakings should be encouraged and eventually recognized as exceptional manifestations, which attune the epistemic approach to the foundations, invariants, the primitive elements of the polyvalent weaving of a culture.

For a long time philosophy has no longer been regarded as a distinct discipline, as a flagship for all other sciences. Philosophy has become an ensemble of autonomous and well-articulated disciplines - morals, aesthetics, epistemology, philosophy of culture, philosophy of history - connected, however, to the primary trunk from which they have separated. An approach is therefore possible by adopting sequentially the principles of those disciplines which declared themselves autonomous. A history of aesthetics or ethics is equally a sequential history of philosophy.

It can also be approached thematically by taking a recurring idea as a paradigmatic perspective and principle in the organization of a historiographical arrangement. Of course, and the approach of Romanian identity, as it has coagulated in the evolution of Romanian culture, can be assumed as an ordained idea and principle and we proceeded accordingly. A history of Romanian identity is, exaggerating a little, and a limited, sequential, miniature history of Romanian philosophy. " (Ionel Necula)

Something sounds in my depth, which wants to get out to people, going over these pages, over my dragon songs and all the plans for future deeds.

The jubilee notes turn our eyes to the expanse of glittering self-reading, in excess of force, with such full and powerful love that it frees itself from the heavy chains of fear, becoming a praise of being, a praise of fulfillment and of being contained in excess: “I feel as if I should speak now, in moments of force and clarity, when I speak more than myself: my soul. I feel as if I could convert all those who hesitate and doubt; For I have more power in me than I can hold in words, and I want to use it to free people from fear, and to convert them to a cult of being sublimated in poetry on the fabulous journey whose protagonists we are: Life.

Mihai-Bogdan Marian’s book is a macroscopic and prefigurative vision of the world in which we live, in which civilization fractures and cleavages show up between seemingly synchronous societies becoming more and more preoccupying. He has the courage to launch inconvenient interrogations and unconventional work hypotheses, but especially to suggest scenarios and to issue warnings that cannot be ignored, upon which we, the present generation, and those who will succeed us have the existential duty to reflect.

The coherent analysis that the young researcher and essayist Mihai-Bogdan Marian offers us is obviously exciting, provocative. Moreover, it implies unavoidable incursions on the recent or earlier history of Europe, of the West, and the relations maintained by these civilizations and strategic planetary centers with the rest of the world. “(Prof. univ. dr. This present story, Dark under the Sun, is reported alternately, the main line of the plot reporting on the actual operations around the events that occurred in Romania in the dramatic December 1989 (exhibited in the form of memories), in a successive deployment, preceding in time the organization of the attack against Fidel Castro, the common bond being the involvement of the same KGB agents. Their bloody confrontation with the Palestinian command team or the blocking of the attempted abduction of the Ceausescus corpses at Otopeni Airport by Chinese agents led by Li Sian gives the action dynamism and suspense, characteristic of all of Abdullaev’s novels.

Cinghiz Abdullaev claims that being a writer means, above all, x-raysing the diseases of your time. In this sense, the writer is obviously approaching - at least in our minds - Lermontov and his remarkable character which occasions the eternal rediscovery of the motif of the double in literature: the troubled Peciorin negative, fierce and brilliant Pechorin”. People have always been fascinated by the idea of winning amounts to increase their budget without too much effort, and gambling (including the Pools) falls into the category of things accessible to everyone.

So how do you play in the Pools? Do we rely on hazard or strategy in choosing winning numbers? By using various combinations, the probability of correctly choosing the 6 numbers from 49 is of almost 14 million different ways. But finding the winning combination is not just science but also art. And art, as a rule, is subjective. Man, by virtue of the emotional perception of the world, attaches to each event the good or evil label. Use the same criterion to pick the numbers at the Pools.

The author, however, takes seriously all the winning strategies, starting from the influence of the seasons and reaching the probability theory. By reading the secrets of the great winners at the Pools, you will surely become experts in discovering the fabulous winnings variant!

Just apply those in this guide, and inspiration will be guaranteed!

A history of gambling, including the Pools, written with veneration and talent, including a number of secrets and mysteries of the most popular and old gambling (Pools, pocker, cards, bridge, whist, etc.).

• How to play in the Pools? This game is not as complicated as it seems to you, especially if you get to know the 20 rules - 20 ways to find lucky numbers.
• The Secret of Success? Well developed strategies, schemes, calculations, a well-thought out game, an exercise of the game acquired by reading this book.
• The Pools is a field of broad analysis, searches, and discoveries for a new branch of scientific research, which we can call the psychological theory of mass games.
• The statistics of previous draws allow us to increase our chances of choosing lucky numbers.
• Fundamental principles that we must learn in order to to win.
• As a “fighting weapon” against bad moves, special words, amulets, talismans, or objects can be used that have been successful or have brought success to someone else at this game.

This is a book about love, about the power of words and the importance of communication, about the importance of feelings and the knowledge of our neighbor. The book is an exchange of emails among the main protagonists. Elena and Tayeb intersperse emails with stories and countless “ups and downs” of situations, environments, characters. There is no continuity, as the author explains, because each story is introduced at a different time and tries to touch the soul of each reader, turning it to the unconditional love that is the foundation of everything, for love - says Gogol - is the homeland of the soul.

Especially interesting is the way in which the author distinguishes between the two apostles of Copernicus, by comparing their speeches. Giordano always expresses himself in the first person, with straightforward arguments, is more impulsive, while Galileo uses elaborate phrases, expressing more abstract thoughts, from a more relativistic perspective. We feel that it is not just a difference of age, but also of temperament, education. Giordano lives intensely in the very middle of things, while Galileo is more often seen on a higher levelling, though much the same thing is the concern of both in the attempt to complete the Renaissance in the scientific and philosophical realm.
It was, apparently, the first time that the patriotic feeling stirred in me the child I was back then, a feeling perhaps related to events, but also to my mental state; or, more likely, to what my father was teaching me, whom I saw quite often in the company of agreeable Jews or Hungarians, speaking undefiled Hungarian, because he had attended the high school in Oradea-Mare, a school which was almost a fortress, managed by the Order of Friars Minor in the 1920s:

“Dad, when shall we be and feel as Romanians do?”

“It’s very simple, my father replied, whenever our country, Romania, is being challenged or even in danger! (Nicholas Breban)

To identify our place in the world, a century away from the Great Union, it is enough to say that we exist at the confluence of the Carpathians with the Danube, the Dniester and the Great Sea, that we come from Rome, that we still call ourselves Romans, that we speak “Danubian Latin”, that we worship the Lord / Dominus, but that we also have the nostalgia of the New Byzantine Rome, intimately known by our ancestors in the tongue of Cyril and Methodius, through alphabetic letters and by the flow of desire in folk songs. In other words, in us are united the two halves of Europe in a concert of culture and civilization, which Aura Christi – discreetly yet unambiguously – sends to us with well-wishing thoughts and through the voice of personalities speaking ex profundis. (Ioan-Aurel Pop)

We have joined the European Union, so we are European citizens... We frequently talk about globalization (without really understanding the phenomenon) and dream of becoming the citizens of the planet... Instead, we forget or ignore, more and more, to think of the place and role of our language and history in the new European and international context, as if the dissolution of the Romanian identity within the European Union would be a natural process.

How did we get here? We have a past, a language, a history, a consciousness of the Romanian identity dating from the time of the chroniclers and continuing with the Transylvanian School, a national specificity, we are surrounded by the tombs of those who gave their all so that we be here today, to whom we are are indebted, just as indebted we are to those who will come after us. We are supported as a nation by strong pillars, deeply rooted in history, and yet we show a form of renunciation to nation consciousness, as if desireous of kneeling down and finally disappearing altogether.
We should wake up and understand that the landmark of the homeland must remain a constant, because before being Europeans or citizens of the world, we are Romanians, and the changes brought about by time, and, implicitly, the adaptation to them must be done with wisdom in the interest of the country and its citizens...

At least, so would a worthy people do. (Bogdan C. Simionescu)

In a “cultural history”, which means a cultural continuum, as Mircea Eliade classifies the space and time of being, truths do not migrate and are not subject to circumstances. In reality, through Creation, through the great Creation, whether divinity has withdrawn from it, or has remained uninvolved in its unfolding, engravings of sacredness remain unaltered, present everywhere in the surrounding realm. It is between feeling and being in them, on the one hand, and refusing or ignoring them, on the other, that the distance is measured by the living. Maybe the lack of a beginning implies the permanence of this beginning as a synthesis of the One with the totality. Hence, the “truth” that existence can be a continuous initiation, with all that this presupposes, completed in the understanding that continuity does not know the fracture of life / death and that the archetypal formula of the eros, as the fulfillment of the harmony of being through love, transgresses the forms of the conjectural as well as those of finitude. The end of Eliade’s novel, Nopti de sânziene (Midsummer Nights) does not solve, but proposes the ultimate dichotomy: is Being the product of the Sacred or is the Sacred the product of Being?

This paper is the result of applied research in the sphere of correctional institutions. Based on professional experience, the author succeeds in transposing in an original manner normative and sociological benchmarks about the importance of studying and supporting discontinuance as a process to be seen in its complexity. It is worth highlighting the author’s efforts to compare the conclusions of Western research and the empirical data from the Romanian space. The book is breaking new ground in the field of criminological research in Romania, addressing probation practitioners and penitentiary units, as well as a lay readership, offering arguments for including the concept of discontinuance in activities aimed at the rehabilitation of criminals. Director Alexa Visarion’s book is a fascinating insight into the world of theatre, and not only. We have before us an exceptional interdisciplinary approach that sometimes hesitates before rules, sometimes breaking them or getting very close to the sphere of clichés, using them, distorting them in order to rebuild a reality, to raise a new one over its ruins which looks surreal. A great artist Alexa Visarion – without purposefully setting out to do this- gives us a lesson in originality and humility, aware of the fact that inside us and above the everything there is Heaven which decides everything. Among the characters of this exemplary book are Shakespeare, Chekhov, Dostoevsky and others, quite a few “literary saints” of world literature, as well as leading protagonists of the Romanian national stage.

“A Beauty builder, Alexa Visarion thinks that the purpose of an artist is to be able to receive from outside himself, from the Creator, the grace whereby he can interact with the world inside and beyond. The Artist is the Messenger.” (Maia Morgenstern)

“Alexa Visarion has allied the way of art with that of life, in different ways, but without abandoning or betraying what he has revealed from the beginning. A destiny and a vocation. Alexa is a sign of talent whose germ has always been present in his being.” (George Banu)

“There are two qualities, I think, in which Alexa’s dramatic performances have always excelled: originality and strength. Originality, but not of the formal kind, not of the exterior, but that most authentic originality rising out of the depth of analysis, the depth to which the director’s thought has always drifted inviting you, in a compelling way, to accompany him. Texts that you were sure you knew, and which you might have seen in other scenic versions, appeared in Alexa’s staging in a versatility that you had never imagined before. Nothing spectacular for the sake of the show, no easy effect to impress the eyes. Everything is essentialized and delivered with a rigour and an uncommon force, in full respect of the writer’s intentions.” (Radu F. Alexandru)
“What has Vis brought to my life? An increase of light, love, a rare heart’s attention that is rare nowadays, and so many things circumscribed, rather, by the ineffable empire, without which the artists, the poets would no longer breathe, suggesting something unthinkable to me, unbelievable: the people who are part of the legions of the angels. Alexa Visarion is a bearer of light, a light given to those around him, that is, as his broad wings break out, as these birds fly to unnecessary heights, rather than those who know how to look through the glass of unconditional love which keeps the world and everything in it that is of the most sublime order…” (Aura Christi)

“This book is a masterpiece, first of all, for the courage of approaching an impossible subject. (...) Aura Christi is dealing with a great subject – it is this detail that, above anything else, justifies the epithet of masterpiece (...) Beyond the great themes – amorality, life, suffering – Aura Christi approaches what connects the two monsters: Dostoevsky and Nietzsche. It is indeed a courageous bet to put these two giants together…” (Nicolae Breban)

“The reopening of the” Nietzsche file” by getting closer to Dostoevsky’s suffering is the highest merit of Aura Christi’s research, which is not just of the scholarly-erudite kind but a lively one as a personal experience. (...) Being between or beyond is to get rid of the radical, anti-Christ reason, and to get access to the included third, the hidden mystery, the divinity, to the real life. However, this exceptional subtlety is, I would say, the major interest aroused by Aura Christi’s book.” (Theodor Codreanu)

“Praise to Suffering seems to me an autobiographical novel, in which the characters come to life in the memory of a child from Bessarabia […], a child who writes this novel, in which he meets some very interesting characters: meets Dostoevsky, meets Nietzsche, witnesses the encounter between Tolstoy and Gogol – an absolutely fascinating encounter in high-flung flights of narration. […] Somewhere Aura Christi exposes her way of working in these hybrid areas between essay, prose and philosophy. There is a lengthy paragraph in Aura Christi’s book in which she reveals what I say, that she is not only a poet but a great a writer of fiction as well. Praise to Suffering is an extraordinary book, not only for its characters, whom the author loved and lived with, but also the Book of God, the future of God.” (Dumitru Radu Popescu)

There are names, lands or things that you do not have to touch. From among these names, holy lands, in the absence of which I cannot imagine my life, are “This book is a masterpiece, first of all, for the courage of approaching an impossible subject. (...) Aura Christi is dealing with a great subject – it is this detail that, above anything else, justifies the epithet of masterpiece (...) Beyond the great themes – amorality, life, suffering – Aura Christi approaches what connects the two monsters: Dostoevsky and Nietzsche. It is indeed a courageous bet to put these two giants together…” (Nicolae Breban)
Dostoevsky and Nietzsche for me: the twin spirits. Two vivid personalities who marked the history of the 19th century passionate thinking and, without their will, the history of mankind. Bidding two dynamic men to come to the fore implies, of course, an amount of risk. Some Augusti spirits, such as Lev Ţestov, Dmitri Merejkovski, or the “metaphysical boyar” Berdiaev, wrote, as is well known, about these argonautes of the underground. I decided to approach these intangible giants from a different angle, for I have noted that one of the major themes, to which Dostoevsky and Nietzsche keep coming back, treating it from different perspectives, is suffering. Their attitude to this quick-moving creature, like dolphins – an attitude to which I have found myself often committed – reduces you, at first, to silence. In the latter times, you are just as quick to turn your face to the presocratic, genial and childlike Greeks, among whom the two Bedouins of the superman would certainly have felt at home.” (Aura Christi)

Published in 2017, format 14,5x20,5 cm, 902 pages
Editura Ideea Europeană

“The Barbarians’ Revenge was born out of an equally individual and collective emotion. The initial poetical impulse of our revenge betrayed, as always, an emotion rather than the theme – the reaction of a scholarly man to the inertia / silence / coldness / autism of the Citadel (Tomitan) to its strongest poetic, literary, cultural voice, functioning both in the symbolic / mythical register and in the real, actual diurnal life of Tomis.

Initial loneliness was later transformed into collective emotion, and this emotion fed into the language and the meaning of this book, beyond the paradigm shift that accompanies our approach: we will have carried on (most probably in 2017) for two millennia without Publius Ovidius Naso and are preparing together the entry into the third millennium without him. Publius Ovidius Naso will have felt here – in a space that refined his (perverse) expertise in cultivating excessive ethnic (even isolationist) virtues – alone among strangers. Our book is, from this perspective, a sign of endeavor to convert his cultural solitude into solidarity, a test of the encounter between our emotion and his text. We have always known that there is no culture outside the encounter of emotions, even if we always miss the chances of figuring them out or of reading them; and we, Romanians, semiotically descending from the lyre of Orpheus, have reason to know that better than others…” (Dorin Popescu)

2000 years without Ovid at Tomis – a weird man, it was he not they who appeared that way – ridiculous in his thin toga when the rocker was roaring, and when chariots crossed over the frozen river, and wine, the best warming remedy, was drunk cut into cubes. Pontic Greeks, Geto-Greeks, Greco-Scythians were, to Ovid, the barbarians at the outer fringes of the Roman world in the Southern European East of the Principality. Ovid, his Latin language and his Roman culture were bearing to this south-eastern European Pontic end the signs of the Empire’s strangeness, while the alterity not in accordance with expectations was to him the very embodiment of the otherness of barbarity. (Liviu Franga)

The author undertakes an analysis of the situation in Romania starting from the concept of ideal. The thesis of the book is that stagnation, lack of interest and the lassitude in our country are to be blamed on the absence of a national ideal. Convinced that terms such as “country project”, “vision”, “national goals” only add up to the deadness of the general state of mind and to intellectual vagueness, the author does not hesitate to use a term which is commonly considered outdated: ideal!

On the occasion of this survey in the abysmal psychology of the Romanian people, there are revealed models, paradigms, tendencies and soul structures present in the everyday, cultural, social and political life of present Romania. Although having a series of notable forefathers (if only to mention Constantin Rădulescu Motru, Lucian Blaga, Emil Cioran, Mircea Eliade, Mircea Vulcănescu, Dumitru Draghicescu, Ștefan Zeletin, Constantin Noica) – such a direction of approaching the soul of the people Romanian was abandoned in the latter times, in line with the new “commands” of globalization and de-nationalization. The author of the book has the courage to resume this research line in a lively, affectionate and sometimes reactive coloring.

The problem of the massive emigration of the Romanians is placed in the same perspective of the absence of the ideal – the only one able to bring together a people among the borders of a country. Missing the ideal, the Romanians are disintegrating and straining in search of their own place, not knowing that the place they are looking for is in fact their own country, a country founded on an ideal to resonate with the deepest levels of their feelings.

In Eros Philosophy, the author fights, like Don Quixote, the windmills of society, feeling thwarted by inhuman politics. In the chapter entitled Erotonomy, the author tries to convince us that the right of man to choose is not less important when it comes to the way he wants to love, the right to health is not more important than the affection without which he cannot live, the right to education is not more important than society’s obligation to create educational institutions based on the value of feelings, and the right to culture is an illusion as long as school, society, the state do not ensure the individual’s access to symbols, models and values of love. The book encapsulates a huge volume of information in the fields of art, culture, religion, law and politics, which are not only arguments to change the erotic mentality, but also to substantiate a philosophy of love. In the chapter entitled Erothosophy, the author destroys the prejudices and stereotypes that keep the individual in a swamp of the senses. The author reveals that the enemy of love is not hatred, but falsehood, imposture, lying, emancipated to the statute of law by couples, families, sects, and “supraerotic” communities. Because of the lack of values, love is being mixed up with sexuality, being considered an appendix of sensuality.

„Philosophy of Money” is a fundamental book by Georg Simmel, in which there is a rigorously articulated original and complex conception of money and its numerous economic, social and psychological functions.

Money, as a concrete value, realizes the continuity of the economy and the relations of economic values among themselves. Stability of the value of money allows for long-term calculations in enterprises with multiple domains, long-term loans, etc. Money provides stability in economic relations. The relativity of economic objects is stronger with the reduction to a common denominator and, especially, when it is represented by money. Only relativity creates the value of things in an objective sense, because it alone puts them away from the subject. Money is however the embodiment of these two determinations, it evades any subjective relationship, in it materializes that beyond of the subject which is the economic circuit.” (Octavian Opriş)

The two world wars and the subsequent peace confirmed Vespasian V. Every man has his destiny. They say you have it in control and manage it as you well please. You are the master, shaping your life as you think it is best, like the sculptor in front of a stone block. And that you go the way you choose, not the other way round. Destiny will follow the snapping of your fingers, and you drive it to your heart’s content. All you have to do is to let yourself be carried away by the stream of life along the line you have scrupulously and intentionally drawn in advance. It sounds so easy. The fact is one forgets what is of utmost importance: the force of destiny. It is independent of our will and of all wills in the world. It is rebellious, indefinable, impalpable, unique. From contact with India, there are live impressions and thoughts about the pantheism of this subcontinent, respect for life, of any form and kind, of true and great universal compassion, instead of the anthropocentric myth inherited from the religions of the arid deserts of the Middle East. “The New Jerusalem” of our creed is accomplished in India today, without fearsome apocalypse and future judgments. What mostly impresses one in the encounter with India is the great resemblance between the thoughts of ancient Greece, Pythagoras, Plato, and those of India informing the Vedas and Upanishads, culminating in Jainism and Buddhism of Universal Compassion for all living creatures, which, in light of writings discovered in the contemporary era – Russian Notovitch and so on – almost comes close to Jesus. The Romanian-Indian affinities have attracted the attention of great spirits, our soul connects with India as Mihai Eminescu did, and our old literature contains much older links, proving our role as a bridge to Eurasia. Rainer Werner Fassbinder (1945-1982), this “human monster and aesthetic genius who felt at home only in his works,” as a journalist wrote, was probably the last great artist of the doomed family. He was 37 when drew he last “line”. An excessively long line, as the lawyers would find. A thing that did not surprise anyone, because Fassbinder consumes everything in excess: alcohol, drugs, women, men. It has, instead, produced art. With stunning impact and incredible abundance. If we sum up, we find that, in only 14 years, he directed 44 films (among them, Berlin Alexanderplatz, probably the most famous among us), wrote 37 film scenarios, 20 songs, drama, directed 25 performances. He was adored, but he also scandalized people, took important prizes (Golden Bear, David di Donatello, etc.). He was considered the “heart” of the new German film (Werner Herzog, Wim Wenders, Volker Schlöndorff). He has been and continues to be one of the most often performed German playwrights, both in Germany and abroad. The present volume – the first in Romanian – comprises three of the most famous plays and the screenplay of one of Rainer Werner Fassbinder’s most significant films.
Let’s go back to Stonehedge, which is a stunning construction, made 4500 years before Christ, as I was saying to you, probably in two stages for more than five centuries. This accomplishment reflects the thought of people with unbelievable astronomical knowledge for that era, similarly to the Carnac monument in France, called the French Stonehege by archaeologists. Both were raised at about the same time and are located on the only latitude of our planet where the sun, at the two solstice – in summer and in winter – is in a position that represents a perfectly right triangle, relative to the parallel of latitude. But you will understand all this later. What I want to tell you now is that all of these edifices, like the pyramids of Egypt, to which I will go next, were made thousands of years ago by other civilizations, which are still unknown.

An hour after the operation, sitting awkwardly on the bed of a ground-floor room, connected to all kinds of resuscitation devices, I was looking out of the wide open door (it was August) onto the park of the hospital. Beyond the green fence that separated it from the city, I saw people walking around, arguing, embracing… well the usual hustle of parks around the world. I was watching and wondering, “Am I going to do it anymore?” As an answer to my deep question, there was a very red-haired squirrel in the open door, with a bigger tail than it needed as a support for the “standing” position it had taken up to look at me.

> Romania has everything it needs to be a well-established nation. Only the threads are wrongly connected. It’s like having a windmill that you put underwater expecting to feed a canned plant in which you would like to make stockings. Romania’s potential is ignored and scattered because Romania’s sub-assemblies are awkwardly connected by a pseudo-elite that does not understand how to structure the Romanians’ national personality. And this structure starts from our proper settlement in relation to the cultural, identity and cultural potential of our ancestors. (…) Beyond pseudo-scholarly discussions about the novelty of the nation concept and the modernity of national myths “invented” by bourgeois elites in the context of their desire to unify the internal market against the background of the collapse of feudal order and the eclipse of Christianity as public orthodoxy, beyond these ideologies which attempts to discredit the national idea by placing it on a certain stage of a cultural evolution that provides for the passage or ascension from the national phase to the supranational and supra-state one, it is only proper that we come to this realization: that, as Iuliu Hațieganu said, “the nation means generational unity. Heroes mean unity of the future. “ And the unity of generations does not need to be legitimated from today to yesterday, since it was already been committed yesterday to this day. We live in this continuity, we are already seated in it. We just need to recognize it and put it to work in this light. (Mircea Platon)
The book includes a number of unusual essays, inspired by everyday issues or results of searches into topics that we rarely think about. In addition, both for the spice of the reading experience, and especially for the democratization of the concept of anthropology (on which the content is hinging), this series of essays, combining ideas of psychology, sociology or philosophy, is interspersed (initially, median and final) with a fictional pieces from the series of speculative-anthropological interpretations of folk myths and legends (such as the legend of the Arge; Monastery and the ballad of The Ewe Lamb), a series of texts beginning with the book entitled The Return of the Prodigal Brother. This volume brings to the reader an amalgam of challenges for the mind and the heart, in a picturesque mix, supported by three main pillars: self-irony, humility and gentleness. Reading in this case can prove to be a great experience for the passionate reader of fiction but also for the one attracted by the speculative essays. Depths and prospects will often surprise.

Nicolae Breban, the creator of the cynical novel in Romania, hostile to our mythified “fatalism”, allows it to return through the back door by the feminisation of the national resistance movement in his surprising novel entitled Play and Run. When I made the selection of the first nine novelists, I did not think that, out of nine limbos, three more “Dantesque” ones would come up to match the three traditional Romanian provinces. I am amazed at their “equality” in the construction of modern Romania, but also in my book. There were three writers, for each province, who assaulted my subconscious: Moldavia (Dimitrie Cantemir, Ion Creanga, Eugen Uricaru), Wallachia (Marin Preda, Eugen Barbu, Mircea Cărtărescu); and Transylvania (Liviu Rebreanu, D.R. Popescu, Nicolae Breban). I had forgotten the contribution of Bessarabia, with its intense destiny, from 1812 onwards. The nine circles turned into a decameron, the tenth prose novelist of the critical construction being Ion Druţă, with the whole drama of a Bessarabia split apart, as revealed in my 2003 book:
This writer of fiction and poems from Sibiu descends from Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu’s school of psychological analysis in the sense of objective subjectivity, if one may say so, which also characterizes the “analytical” and “creative style of “Camil Petrescu, Anton Holban, M. Blecher, Henriette Yvonne-Stahl, Dana Dumitriu, etc. It is true that the emphasis falls in her writings on the observation of interiority. The theme of loneliness and the life of the couple occupy centre stage from the very beginning (The White Blood of the Stones, The Sand of Memory, Beyond Love), usually through reminiscencing, where the epic exists, but it is usually the meticulous analysis and the essayistic reflection that prevail. Such is the spirit of modern literature, not that of prose writing of the Princess of Cleves tradition, or from romanticism to naturalism.

The world evoked by the fiction of Rodica Braga is lighted from within by a profound knowledge of the psychic springs of the human being and the mystery of a totalitarian love, designed either in the urban or rural universe. Her novels enthrall the reader due to their expressive language in an attempt to decipher the complicated psychology of the self and in the process of discovering the self through love. All through time the great love novels as the essence of life, by virtue of a universal principle of harmony, have found their way into print. Such a novel has Rodica Braga published, entitled Summer of Pain, a novel of deep vibration in the soul through the power of love, a love song, as a music in which the couple resonates with the universe. (Sonia Elvireanu)

Professor Carol Popa was discovered five hundred kilometers from Bucharest, in the heart of the Carpathian Mountains, at Doruna – where he was born. “being thrown there,” as one might say. He had boarded the train, spending almost a night in the sleeping carriage.

And all because Hana, born in Doruna, a Doruna Jewish girl, wanted him to respond positively to the invitation of local officials to meet Dorone’s “famous sons” in a grand event, but it had not been like that. The present book, which the reader is now holding in his/her hands, is – literally speaking –, a very complex one, spinning several narrative voices, of which only some belong directly to the author, having an exorcistic function. Genius of the Heart is a poet’s response to a quintessential personal experience, in which joy and suffering intertwine in order to express a tense yet full state of grace. There is a voice of biographical experience in this feverish book, another belongs to a witness or participant in history, just as there is a voice of power and one of the victim. Above all, however, it is not necessarily triumphant, but lucid-cerebral, the calling of the two beliefs for which it is worthwhile living and remembering your life when you have reached the crossroads: the belief in the culture of the models that preceded you and faith, not of the ingenuous sort, but emerging from knowledge, from the profound sacredness of those lived and from transcendence. (Stefan Borbély)

A text dubbed “book of my enlightenments” and a title such as “The Underworld Story” placed in the opening of the first part of the volume are sure to take us on the road to the Self, for ever winding around Plato’s Cave. It is a tentative approach, never completed, and almost excluded from the plasma of communication, which – as is the case with Aura Christi’s “novel” in verse – has no correspondence, does not come close to the Buddhist experience, nor to the prerogatives of New Age occultism, but brings us in the neighborhood of the injunction on the frontispiece of Apollo’s Temple in Delphi, subsequently used to by Socrates to separate being from seeming: “Know yourself!” You can meet on this road also that daimon that guarded the thinking of the same wise atheist as another face of the “underground” of being, where light is mixed up with darkness, a state rendered poetical by Goethe, but tragically dropped by Dostoevsky. It’s a descent to understanding through comprehension and implicitly by reaching out to infinity. (Mircea Braga)

Aurai Christi’s book, Genius of the Heart, looks like a massive, lonely rock in a pastoral landscape. Genius of the Heart has originality and strength. The first part is lyrical, the second (in a way) – a black-satirical comedy, the third – predominantly epic-narrative. The first part is excellent; I have made a note of a number of memorable poems. The second one, especially in its middle, has extremely interesting, pleasant and funny passages, despite the tone, sometimes journalistic. The third is impressive in its totality, harmoniously-coherent, with a heartfelt sincerity. Throughout the volume, the historical, the religious, and the subjective keep good company with one another. I do not like the praises of Nietzsche! In fact, how does this writer link to the Bible, the Gospels?! Aura Christi may be proud of a major, totally original achievement. She probably did not read the romantic British Wordsworth, but he’s the one who wrote (or started writing) a memorable autobiography in verse. He had but few followers. We could say that Aura is among the few. (Virgil Nemoianu)

Nietzsche is perhaps the most illustrious victim of the Socratic adventure of self-knowledge. Life does not have original phenomena, but only some repetitive ones, which are reborn through eternally identical replication. The framework of repetition is not life, for life itself is a phenomenon of repetition. Man is condemned to live through a boring succession of rehearsals and repeats from which he cannot escape. There are absolutely unique phenomena that are not repetitive and probably the same happens with people. They have all existed many times in the past, and will be many times in the future. All that had to happen and could happen has already occurred. The rest is just a monotonous rehearsal: the eternal return of the same. The eternal return expresses, not the restoration of the Heraclitean flow, but the great lines of stability in existence. Through it, Nietzsche wants to eternalize what is transitory, counting time as an eternal return, that is, change and stability. Ecce homo is also the exercise of this impasse of Nietzsche’s thinking. With this, Nietzsche contributed to the establishment of a new “idol” of the modern world after having denounced the presence of “idols” of all sorts in its consciousness. (Vasile Muscă)

“As it is my intention within a very short time to confront my fellow men with the very greatest demand that has ever yet been made upon them it seems to me above all necessary to declare here who and what I am. As a matter of fact this ought to be pretty well known already for I have not neglected to “bear witness” about myself. But the disparity between the greatness of my task and the smallness of my contemporaries is apparent by the fact that people have neither heard me nor yet seen me. I live on my own credit — is it only a prejudice to suppose that I am alive at all? I only need to speak to any one of the learned people who visit the Ober Engadine in the summer to convince myself that I am not alive. Under these circumstances it is a duty— and one against which my customary reserve and the pride of my instincts rebel to say: Listen to me! I am such and such a person. Above all do not confuse me with what I am not!” (Friedrich Nietzsche)

In another book, an essay book on modern world poetry, Jidi Majia casts a wide net of great poets proving his profound understanding of the world poetic phenomenon of the twentieth century. It is a book that can serve as a valuable guide amidst the great currents of modern poetry. I insist on his modernity not only in form but in the very substance of his poetry that qualifies him for a seat among the great Chinese poets of our days. Jidi Majia is a major contributor to the process of rendering Chinese poetic creation synchronous with the great phenomena of modernity while preserving the heritage of a literature that counts history in millennia. It is a great surprise, a great achievement and an inestimable gift to the Romanian reader. (Eugen Uricaru)

Some of us have experienced hard times that we sometimes dream of, report on them or write about, without the terrible passion that engulfed the then-profiteers who still hurt us, and even worse than “at that time”, as they say. It is true that we have foreseen it in one way or another, telling those who were willing to listen to us, without pretending, God forbid, to consider ourselves dissidents, as the ones mentioned above did. Our predictions were based on a certain knowledge of the course of history, which, as we know, is repeated, with small differences, of course. However, some knowledge of the political economy does not ruin us even today, so that we realize the frequent game of transition from political economy to economic policy, and, especially, of the passage from one system or economy to another and vice versa, as we have lived them: from capitalism to socialism and vice versa.

As a sort of oddity, the thoughts of the Lancaster philosopher’s new era or new age (New Age) remained, especially since they were achieved only after the fall of communism, which Lucian Blaga, the philosopher born in Lancram, had not predicted. (Alexandru Surdu)

In the Philosophy of Merit, the author uses the phenomenological method to present the evolution of the socio-moral institutions that govern merits; with this aim in view, Parlagi creates original concepts, such as ideonomy (the system of ideas that theoretically substantiate a system of appreciation of merit); sociology (the system of rules that socially legitimizes a specific merit within a community), and polynomiality (the system of rules by which political merit is institutionalized). The Treaty is structured in three parts, corresponding to the three existential domains in which the human, spiritual, social, and political beings manifest themselves. It presents in extenso the criteria, principles and forms of the manifestation of merit, the prerequisites for the constitution of social systems of appreciation of merit, the bio-psychic and socio-moral nature of merits, as well as the normative character of the political-juridical merits. The first part deals with the sphere of merit of anthropological, anthroponomic and anthropocratic character. The second part enlarges upon the merits of sociological, sociomonomic and sociocratic character, and the third part analyzes the forms of manifestation of merit from the perspective of politology, politonomy and politocracy. In each chapter, there are logical, etymological and sociological arguments that justify the appreciation of human attributes and qualities as individual merits. Each of the 27 chapters explains a type of merit from a triple perspective: ideal, social and political.

Young academic Mihai-Bogdan Marian’s book, devoted to the analysis of international conflicts, is an invitation to lucidity, autonomous, uninhibited reflection, applied research, freed from a priori prejudices and partisanship. The author is an analyst for whom the exercise of probing into causes and circumstances that favor the emergence and intensification of international conflicts is not fortuitous or superfluous. Its main idea is that any such conflict can be prevented. And if it has, of course, been triggered and developed, perhaps escaping from control, it can be defused, the factors involved in this process having at hand standard algorithms and procedures that should not be the object of extremist action which, by its failure, actually legitimates the further escalating of the conflict as such. In history, the most valuable thing is that things are true, and if we do not know them thoroughly, we do not have to worry either about what we do not know; the worst thing is to misinterpret things deliberately and to pass them off for history. (Xi Zhongxun)

Xi Zhongxun, the father of China’s President, Xi Jinping, was a comrade in arms of Mao Zedong and Zhou Enlai, one of the vice presidents of the State Council and pioneers in Deng Xiaoping’s reformation and opening up of China. The book presents the environment in which Xi Jinping grew and the path of its formation. Xi Jinping’s style and governance are strongly influenced by his father and his family, with deep roots in the tough and wise life of the early twentieth-century Chinese village. The book includes numerous and very precious unusual images of Xi Jinping’s adolescence and youth.

A young left-wing militant from Venezuela has the great chance of obtaining a scholarship in Romania. It is the year 1978, the year in which Romania enters a road with a unique meaning, the road of economic disaster and social conflict, caused by the austerity measures of an unprecedented harshness, taken by the political regime of Nicolae Ceausescu. The unexpected experience of a young idealist, illusioned by the romanticism of his semi-legal or even illegal activity against another dictatorship in his country, is both fascinating and traumatic. The young student from Cluj finds a contradictory Romania, a high-quality academic environment, a group of intellectuals, almost of the same generation, animated by generous ideas and romantic ideals, but caught in the hands of commands and restrictions that do not have anything in common with these ideas and ideals. The story of the conversion to reality and the recognition of the truth – this is the road of Damascus that the young militant took from Venezuela to communist Romania in the 1980s. A quasi-fictional book, with insightful observations and love for the country where the author was formed as an intellectual. Today the author is one of the leaders of the democratic opposition movement in his country, a university professor and a well-known political commentator in the print and visual media.

„The same can be seen among playwrights, If their plays fail, they will blame the actors.” – Al.O. (Păstorel) Teodoreanu (1894-1964), „Speech – a poem”

The surprise encounter of two former friends after 50 years revives a wound they thought to have healed. This reunion takes place in a hospital where the two are interns forced to share the same room. Feelings are transformed by the ongoing events. The celebration of the 26 years since the flight from Romania to the renewed life in the West is disturbed by the mischief of 17-year-old son, Chris, the youngest in his family. Under the influence of an Imam, he becomes a Muslim, and decides to fight in the so-called Islamic state. “Love is a very big thing,” a little girl writes in her diary. But sometimes it is so great that the heart becomes the key to happiness, on condition that all obstacles are eliminated. Will crime manage to remove all obstacles? Pater noster, our everyday prayer, can become, for a renowned writer, the basis of his success. Together with his two sons, he sets up several businesses that prove profitable. The interview taken by a television editor confirms these successes... which prove to be not exactly literary.

„Le grand inconvenient des livres nouveaux, c’est qu’ils nous empêchent de lire les anciens” (The great disadvantage of new books is that they prevent us from reading the old ones) – Joseph Joubert (1754-1824)

How do you write to a childhood boyfriend you have not seen for over 40 years? You wonder, “Does he still live? And if so, what’s the point? And then what should I write to him?” I think the best solution would be to write a letter, but I will not send it to him anymore. The killing of your wife, whom you loved most of all in the world, tortures you to the end of your life. Hate against the assassin obsesses you, even after his death. A hate that you also feel for his child, even if that child is of your own blood. Finding a salary in the West that you cannot have in Romania leads to the breakup of the family and the alienation of the father. Of course, with tragic consequences sometimes, even if their story may be funny.

Just like Emil Ratiu’s previously published novels – which rewrite some of our great myths – the novel entitled “Coltea Tower” is woven on a major theme, namely the problematic existence of man as a being between time and eternity, between the now and the everlasting. The major dilemma of life is the Janus face of reality, perceived by the senses as flow and fragmentation in things, while thought – through the philosophy of Parmenides, Pythagoras, Plato and others – will conceive of the eternal unity of Being, the passage being just an illusion of our senses. Man is trapped in the middle, between time and eternity, not a fortunate fate at all...
This human existence between instant and eternity, in permanent confrontation with eternity, is the central knot of ontology, is the object of the characters’ reflection, beginning with St. Sava’s Academy teacher, Mihai Ciubotel, whose “avatars” going down to our times (the 21st century), defined as neo-Fanariotism (obedience to rulers originating in the Fanar district of Istanbul) and servile subordination to new centers of power.

The novel takes its heroes along three hundred years of history, from St. Constantin Brancoveanu, martyr by the Turks, to Eminescu and to the present moment, ending up with optimism and the expressed hope that, despite all the difficulties, the light and truth of the Romanian nation will finally overcome.

“When the performance turns out unbearably bad, actors will say it was the play’s fault.”

Al.O. (Păstorel) Teodoreanu (1894-1964)

On his deathbed, in an elegant hospital in America, a man reminiscences his life with his guardian angel. He spent his childhood in Romania, from which he fled when he got the opportunity. In the West, his chain of adventures are crowned with exceptional success. That, however, in the dirty ways which he had chosen. Sixty years after the high school graduation is the occasion of a meeting, in the classroom of the last survivors. Of the 44 graduates, only 11 could be identified, but only 7 were present at their jubilee. What else could they do besides answering the question, “What have you done in your life?” Old age, with its sufferings, cannot uproot the most beautiful flower of man: friendship. After the many years that had gone by, it could not have a future but only a past. It is only Alec who wishes to prolong the past by abducting part of the future.

In a country like ours, of endemic instability, nineteenth century Junimea Society and its Literary Conversations Magazine were a blessing of solidity that was also known in the interwar period without being able to settle in for long on account of the war and the dictatorships that accompanied and followed it. Their renewing breath still seems far away, not to say impossible to return to Romanian culture under the pressure of globalism and multiculturalism, of deliberate deconstruction in all social, cultural, material and spiritual manifestations. It’s a model that even after a hundred and fifty years is still sending out its rays, without getting back an adequate reflection. What distinguished the criticism practiced at Junimea from other critics of the age or of the predecessors was the common attitude, affirmed by Maiorescu, the respect for the truth. The importance and influence of Junimism in the political sphere are on the same level as those affirmed on a cultural and literary level, but it is true, not as enduring, politics being much more ephemeral but not less involved, with immediate effects, and often on medium and long term in the country’s social life. I see in Aura Christi a highly exponential Romanian writer of the era of globalism (mondialism) and multinational Europeanism, since, like a symbolic tree, she has her roots in Bessarabia (a former component of the Soviet Union, the current Republic of Moldova) and the crown in Romania, a member of the European Union since 2007. Her whole writing is an expression of a personal and collective destiny. Welling up from her creative personality, her writing acquires an elevated literary expression. She carries the unmistakeable mark of the canonical scope. (Marian Victor Buciu)

Aura Christi has found the language in which to pour out experiences that seemed to be beyond discursive articulation: the degradation of humanity to the point where someone kills with the full approval of consciousness in the name of an idea, man’s place being usurped by a monster. It is not the crime rate, as impressive as it is, that mainly interests Aura Christi. She adds up Dostoevsky and Nietzsche to get the anatomy of absolute evil. The evil in the heart of man. The titles of her books suggest a moralised geography: The House of Darkness, The Sphere of Cold, The Wild Circle. In the West, it was philosopher Nietzsche who influenced postmodern epistemology by deconstructing logocentrism. In Romania, Nietzsche was used to demystify morality by two brilliant minds of contemporary literature: Nicolae Breban and Aura Christi. Nicolae Breban, a novelist, chose a Nietzsche of the will to power and the master soul. Aura Christi was attracted to a Nietzsche of aporia, who in Ecce homo identifies Christ with Dionysus. As Aura Christi says, “gentleness ends in the claws.” She is a writer of a fallen East, which includes Ismail Kundera, Bashkim Shehu, or the Strugatski Brothers, because in all of them a cosmic reality is revealed through bits of the human soul. (Maria-Ana Tupan)
Critical novelties are devastating: the reality of the real can no longer be decoded, reinvented, etc. after repeated encounters with the text, after its repeated deformations, after its transfigurations and metamorphoses; at the very most, criticism makes possible an invented reality, a replotted invention of what would have been left of the real after its repeated deformations and the multiple incarnations in other texts; a decoding of reality is not even possible through the critical text once it uses a similar pattern to the literary one in its naïve attempt to demolish all the barriers separating it from the real world; the critical text can no longer explain the literary text from the perspective of its own way in which it recombines, invents or only distorts the real and the work on the real world, whose reinvention after its dramatic wrestling with the text becomes utopian. The critical text proposes / establishes a real reality, acritical reality, which is only an invented form of all previous encounters between the real and texts as critical objects. It is a recompense, an invention, a mask, a fantasy that, unlike literary inventions (which notoriously deform the real), relies on the cultural lie (or naivety only) to claim that it possesses scientific instruments to retrieve the real from the text, and to hold the entire tool kit for retrieving reality from the tight grasp of its textual corsets. (Dorin Popescu)

A novel wrapped around a dramatic human existence. Lying in an Italian prison for a hypothetical crime, a young Roma woman, Mianda, remembers her past from a dual perspective: realistic, going through events from childhood, adolescence and youth, and myths prefiguring a tragic destiny. A past without history and an uncertain future are the coordinates of the heroine’s life, an exponential character for the exotic ethnicity of the Roma. Originating in the Oltenian Plain, he Roma community lives, symbolically, between a big city and a tiny village. An orphan, Mianda gets to a schooling center near Bucharest, where she does not stay, as she is tempted by the capital city mirage, so different from the environment in which she had grown. The open end of the novel leaves a ray of hope in the process, the young woman hoping to prove her innocence.

The notion of Allegory is studied in light of medieval literature, but as used in later epochs including the complex and rich bibliography that has been devoted to it in the last decades and which gives rise to discussions and interpretations such as the present book.

N. Steinhardt’s work has the “ability” to discourage attempts at systematization and critical analysis. Belonging to an erudite Jewish intellectual, a feverish spirit, avid of clarification and affirmation, it is branching out in terms of literature, theology, political ideologies, or constitutional law. In the interwar period, that of his intellectual-spiritual formation, N. Steinhardt published in just a few years a work of constitutional law, two studies of Judaism, a volume of parodies and over one hundred literary studies and articles of liberal-conservative ideology. In the post-war period, from the late 1960s, he wrote memoirs and short novels, translations, carried out a sustained journalistic activity that would last until 1989, and wrote erudite theological papers and sermons. The volumes of critical essays by N. Steinhardt of the 1970s and 1980s, his only publications in the communist era, enjoyed a positive reception, but the writer’s controversial position to the regime led to his marginalization. It was only with the posthumous publication of the Journal of Happiness (1991), the Words of Faith (1992) and the Truth of Confession (1993) that the wider public acknowledged the intellectual and moral value of his writings and his non-conformism in the decades of totalitarianism.

For Nietzsche, everything matters as a sign that points beyond itself to a higher level of meaning. Things do not exist within their own horizon, but instead each metamorphoses into a sign. Each can be defined as a veiled meaning, self-contained, to be developed through interpretation, open to the hermeneutic act. It offers a new perspective on the world and the things contained in it. The world becomes only a perspective of seeing things, a play of perspectives, that is, of interpretations. That is why there are no things but only interpretations of things. It also offers the possibility of slipping into radical skepticism. What do we do if we admit that this statement is just an interpretation, that is, a perspective? We are inevitably pushed to relativistic skepticism as the final solution to which Nietzsche’s actions lead, everything being a sign to be deciphered, interpreted, the world shares the condition of a fatal lack of its unique meaning; Any sign can be interpreted in a way – which does not exclude the possibility, at least theoretically, of being interpreted in many infinite forms. I’ve been looking for time to read your book carefully, though some fragments were already known to me. It expresses you very well: it is polemic, has the energy I have already felt you possessed, following your call, your way of seeing things, being together with the “great people” and fighting together for the values you believe in. It is vital and, as in literary theoretician Adrian Marino, repetition is motivated by (and expressing) intensity. Reading beyond its challenging character and the sense of affirmation of solidarity with the community you feel attached to would be a miss. I think it was very good to start with the Marino case, because it is exponential, and more obvious than others. (Gabriel Andreescu)

The central idea that goes like a red thread through the whole book: “I do not think globalization, spread around the globe, has shaken the identity of the French, Germans, Spaniards or the roots of other nations. As strange as it may ring in the ears of Romanian commentators, adepts of the right policy, I will tell a truth familiar to the great nations of the world. There are things that cannot be negotiated. Among these are the country, family, language, identity and race.” In Romania, these dimensions of our being have been “bargained” for over two decades under mysterious conditions of intimidation, and threats about not being integrated in the “world”, European and global, if you do not give up your own identity as distinguishing mark of your own human, natural, spiritual resources. However, Romanian writers, from the early modern chroniclers to the 19th century Transylvanian School, the 1948 generation, the great classics, the generation of the Great Union, and the interwar one were the guardians of the Romanian being through the force of their creation and their ethos, with interruptions in the dogmatic sixth decade, but revived with the ’60s generation of Nicolae Labiş, Nichita Stănescu, Nicolae Breban, Ioan Alexandru, with Cezar Ivănescu and Aura Christi as soon as a part of the eighties generation woke up and broke away from postmodernist simulations. The phrase “treason of the clerisy” has a double meaning: the Romanian writers being betrayed by the post December 1989 political elites, or, the writer, for his part, giving up on being the guardian of our national being. The solution, according to Aura Christi, is, on the one hand, Heideggerian worlding of being through poets, on the other, the return to the old table of European and Romanian values, all abandoned by the postmodernist mental make-up. (Theodor Codreanu)

What are these polemical attitudes? A number of excellent arabesques, the pathetic and lucid x-ray of an inner split, a series of attempts to understand, ending up in misunderstanding, the reporting of anathematized rebellions in the wake of despair, and the refusal to accept being a passive witness – reduced to mutilation, therefore, guilty from the start – to the commercialization, the trivialization of the communist hell. The process culminated, incredibly, with a massacre of the innocents perpetrated in a neo-Stalinist style. How to qualify otherwise the wild hunt of the Romanian personalities who saved the European culture of Romania during the Stalinist-Dejist dictatorship? Hunting organized under our eyes in our poor democracy.

What are these polemics? Perhaps a sign of hope that not everything has been sold out. It’s not all that terrible. Not everything is lost. (Aura Christi)

Open society against the open society. The Romanian society between utopia and reality is a profound and complex analysis of the most important sociopolitical paradigm of postmodernity, together with the concrete realities that are being built around it. A paradigm that aims to change the face of the world in ways in which for more than 25 years we see manifested on multiple coordinates the domestic social and political realities, which, the author is carefully deconstructing with the eye, mind and knowledge of the specialist, but also with the soul and the conscience of the one belonging to the Romanian society.

The present book is about the open society, but also about the past, present and future prefigured to the world in this paradigm, and about the evolution of Romanian society as an integral part of this world. It surprises and questions many aspects, taking into account both the intrinsic nature of the concept of open society and the changes that the implementation of this concept as a social reality presupposes and enforces in contemporary societies. The book is therefore recommended as a useful, provocative, and at the same time revealing reading to all those who are concerned with social and political sciences, but also those who are interested in understanding in depth the system of profound causality that influences the course of the world in general and Romanian society in particular.(Maria Voinea)
As well as in low life, “attempts and errors” are also present in homo sapiens, but the effects are more serious, often affecting the lives and habitat of the other inmates of our modest planet. If we take into account only the tragic balance of the last world wars, we will better understand what “attempts” – domination, pride, economic, ideological or racist foolishness – and “errors” were recorded in respect to the human condition and its historical destiny. Democracy does not escape the eternal human experience of “trials and errors.”

In the aftermath of communism Romania has embarked on the newly elected path of democratic politics, but without an authentic tradition, political knowledge and experience doubled by true education and practice. Yet democracy had to be established, practiced, developed. How? By “attempts and errors”. In other words, through an “empirical” method common to any brand new action that people are trying to practice for their own sake. We will try to track this new and diverse activity of Romania’s socio-political reconstruction; in which good intentions, ignorance, interests, imposture, desire for power and enrichment marked the great show of “Attempt and Error” that served as an improvised solution to a “revolution” that seemed endless.

Hegel is the most systematic philosopher, whose work is coherently articulated and supported by a dense conceptual fabric and a teleology with a pronounced axiological character. Hegel wanted, and in part succeeded, to build an articulated and comprehensive conception of man, society, nature and divinity. Every component of his philosophical system, logical structures, society, art, politics, or history cannot be understood without the whole that encompasses them, determines them, giving them transparency and meaning. Hegelian political thought is not a simple meditation on the state and its institutions due to conjuncture or any practical implication of the philosopher in the politics of his time. Hegelian meditation on politics is the necessary consequence of speculative thinking in his massive philosophical work. Politics is an important component of the ontological structure of the world, an essential moment for the realization and functioning of Freedom. Reason in action, crystallized in a diversity of behaviors, structures and institutions, configures the practical universe, concretizing the theoretical spirit and organizing a new ontic region.

“With The God’s Orbit- a compact volume, which opens its wings under a motto borrowed from Bacovia (which also took my steps into the art and myth of the novel only half a century ago!) – Aura Christi has provided her readership with a hallmark of her poetic work: a vision of painful clarity of the nature of her entire imaginary wanderings, a surprising revisiting of the gods, which gives a classical, unitary touch to the volume. With a few signs, perhaps even a sort of lyrical steam coming from the intimate distance of some poets such as Hölderlin, Rilke, Blaga or Nichita, celebrating Brodsky or Ahmatova.Here is, very succinctly, an admirable sample of a singular poetic and initiatic courage: the re-placement of a poet, in the language of Eminescu, in the great themes of modern European etymology, fertile to anyone endowed with ingenuity, but also withcourage, Prophetic I would say, to discover yourself. (Nicolae Breban)
“Aura Christi dares, through this new volume, the most accomplished of all that she has written so far, to take classical poetry into the ken of contemporary poetry. The verse is perfectly cadenced by a sober, sophisticate, inner musicality without a single syncope that is the exclusive achievement of great poets. Grand topics are approached, but not in the form of slogans, as do the naive or beginners. Discreet confession, which does not go down to the unrecognizable recording of sensations or sentimental tingling of events related to their austere nudity – represents a polemic situation for the unrepeatable biography of a denizen in the great hall of poetry over the last two decades. It is a classic poetry, expressing anxiety, but a fruitful, self-satisfied anxiety. Everything seems to be written in the tone of the one who knows, who has crossed the “drama of lucidity”, which has reached that point of understanding from where reality, although it cannot be controlled, has no creases, obscure niches; Such a perspective is very demanding, tough, so everything seems to be written with a knife to the bone, but it transmits equilibrium, it is not confusing. Though it’s all quit and search and convulsion, “it’s all,” as a very nice poem says, “quiet.” From the amount of heavy anxiety comes a quiet-synthesis, which reconciles them all and reconciles you to yourself. Yourself as a poet and yourself as a reader. Thus we have discreetly defined the classical attitude, the truly classical attitude. A kind of overall balance, through nothing strident: background, form, musicality, attitude and vision, in the end. With the Orbit of the God, Aura Christi has contributed one of the most substantial volumes of poetry, so flattened rhetorically, of the last years.” (Bogdan Cretu)

“The poet does not dissociate, but brings names and things into an intelligible relationship. Lyrics marked off by the use of antonomasia (a figure that describes instead of naming: “Give me a name for the one who...”) indicates man’s relationship with divinity as the prototype of logic by which work is attached to meaning. It is not, therefore, an aesthetic of beautiful appearances / dresses, but a semiotic one, of enlightening phenomenon with a profound meaning. The fruit of a religious imagination, the Orbit of the God has falled into the mould of great poetry. (Maria-Ana Tupan)

After Shakespeare, Bertolt Brecht is the most widely performed playwright in the whole world drama. Considered the most important playwright of the twentieth century, he revolutionized contemporary theatre and was staged by the greatest directors of the world. Unfortunately, only a few of his plays have been translated and published in Romania. Even they bear – to a considerable extent – the ideological footprint of the period in which they were translated: the 1950s and 1960s. Besides these influences, there are numerous stylistic and weighty alterations in plays such as The Beggar’s Opera or Mutter Courage and Her Children. Often, songs from these plays (which cannot be used, according to the author’s and the editors’ rights, except for the music composed by Kurt Weil) display a floppy prosody. For example, an important song in Mutter Courage, which originally consists of five stanzas and choruses, has only three stanzas in the Romanian version. This volume, produced in collaboration with the EuroPress Group Publishing House, is the first published in Romania in the last half of a century. The expertise of the translations in this volume, commissioned by the Traduki Foundation, highlights their impeccable quality, with a special emphasis on the quality of the translations of the Brechtian lyrics. This anthology includes the plays Baal, Tobe in the Night, In the Jungle of Cities, A Man Will Be a Man and The Beggar’s Opera. This is the most valuable act of restoring to Romanian theater gems from one of the most important German playwrights of all time.

The book is an attempt to answer questions such as: What is man? Who is man? Why is the man? The book includes topics of meditation inspired by philanthropic philosophy and psychological analysis, in the way of confessions, being structured along three lines. Abusive words are a charming, chaotic, puerile thought, the first discovery of one’s own self being caught in a contradiction between the world’s thinking and one’s own mind, feeling therefore the need to duplicate one’s thought as disagreements. Dialogues are the discovery of the character in his own mind, the discovery of the characters of life and the fugitive memories of ordinary events that fall within the province of paranoid subjectivism.

The third part deals with the so-called Universal Narrator’s objectivity, which reinterprets and reintegrates the thoughts of a randomly chosen man. The proof that man sums up everyone in himself, the entire world.

Preface by Andrei Vochin
Many of them I have commented live! Others I have watched playing, and the rest of them I found about by reading the great chroniclers of those times... Having an experience of over 2000 games commented at top competitions, Bogdan Socol is introducing us to the lives and careers of “100 legendary footballers”. At the end of years of careful and beautiful work, the Digi Sport commentator has managed to collect 400 pages of 100 special stories about people who marked not only the history of football but also humanity through their impact. In “100 legendary footballers”, you will find out how a football match saved the life of a future world champion, why the greatest Italian striker of all times is best motivated before matches, or who was the first player to make a change without the coach having any say.

Throughout the reading of this book, you will follow the 100 heroes from the interwar period to the present day, passing through the dramatic events around the Second World War, through communism that obstructed so many great careers, through military dictatorships in Latin America and over the Cold War map of uncertainty. Football defeated all the problems, however, and went further on with its stories. “100 legendary footballers” also pays homage to the greatest Romanian players who marked our existence: Nicolae Dobrin, Ilie Balaci, Gica Hagi, Gica Popescu and Miodrag Belodedici.

Bogdan Socol included 100 legendary footballers in the history of this sport inbetween the covers of his late publication. I cannot venture to say that they are the greatest, because in any such investigation no argument is stronger than another. Perhaps one of us has passed unnoticed, maybe we, the elders, have caught others playing and saw them live, which is why we could say they were better than others who got a mention in the book. In fact, it does not matter anymore. What will remain when you finish reading the last story in this volume will be a feeling of excessive information, the enjoyable satiety that any sporting consumer desires. Even more so, one who is also a life prisoner og in this wonderful prison of passion called football. (Andrei Vochin)

For the spectator initiated in the political aspect of the Shakespearean theatre, Carlos Manuel Varela’s Interrogatorio en Elsinore proposes „a kind of extended palimpsest” of Hamlet that connects on stage a troubled, fictional Elsinore to the traumatic reality of Uruguay during the military junta. For the reader fascinated by comparative literary studies and implicated in the theatre world, Interrogatorio en Elsinore resonates with Nedjalko Iordanov’s The Murder of Gonzago by drawing from parallel extreme ideologies of neo-fascist and communist dictatorships and their institutionalized regime of terror. Both plays showcase the potential of the performance in Hamlet to underpin the role of the artist in the political landscape.
Although only forty-four years of age, Lukas Bärfuss is a living classic. Translated into more than 25 foreign languages, his plays are staged across Europe, the Americas, and Asia. In recent years, his plays have been performed more often than those of Max Frisch and Friedrich Dürrenmatt taken together. Between 2001 and 2015 he received 17 important prizes (i.e., more than one prize per year), including the coveted Mülheimer Dramatikerpreis, Schiller-Preis, Berliner Literaturpreis, etc. Our Parents’ Sexual Neurosis is the first volume of plays published by this famous author in Romania and it includes six of his most important plays. In fact, the title play was staged by Radu Afrim and was screened in Germany in 2015 under the title Dora oder die sexualuellen Neurosen unserer Eltern.

(Victor Scoradet)

“An autobiographical tone, perfectly grounded, is feeding into Breban’s conception at this level, the great stake of the book being to prove – what the novelist has already done – that the generation he himself belongs to (Nichita Stanescu, Matei Calinescu, a.o.) transformed literature into a germ cell of excellence by promoting aesthetics as a sublime to the surrounding ideological grotesque. We must admit that Breban sounds authoritative and impeccable every time he states this dichotomy. It should not be forgotten that The Dramatic History of the Present was conceived when he was fighting against the false accusations of his collaboration with Ceausescu’s secret police. There is no reply to all that, however, insidious, revengeful or resentful: only ideas and facts, not psychology. With due respect!

“(Ștefan Borbély)

“Only culture can cure us of this” identitarian uncertainty “, and only culture can ennoble our history which dissatisfies Nicolae Breban…. He is also launching other prophecies, for instance, in the final chapter, where he speaks about national specificity…. It is a theme that we, Romanians, always bring into question either to Satanize or to defend it. I have noticed that N. Breban does not reject it, as planners, as globalists do, nor does he “magnify it” with an apologetic discourse, as locals do. He proceeds correctly, as any lucid and responsible intellectual do, i.e. he analyzes a concept (an essential concept) and tries to see its future... It makes him sad to think about the political world of today and the rhetoric of resentment and revenge that dominates the intellectual world... After twenty years of freedom how is it possible that Romanian intellectuals, especially writers (who displayed a dignified conduct under the totalitarian regime) should hate one another with undefiled sincerity? I remember a sentence from Eminescu (reproduced from memory): “You are not free if you are not right.” It can be put the other way round: “You are not right if you are not free”. Free, when it comes to men of letters, from prejudices, complexities and idiosyncrasies, from the failures and frustrations which history has heaped on us and which the spirit cannot master.” (Eugen Simion)

The book may be considered a sequel to the two previously published by Europress Group Publishing House: DonQuixotisms (2014) and Anthropo-Lexis (2015), but it includes only fiction (not essays as well, as its precedents). Moreover, some “key pieces” from the previous volumes, including the amazing speculative reinterpretations of popular myths and legends, were taken over, for example, the biblical myth of the prodigal son’s return, and the two famous Romanian ballads, The Argeş Monastery and The Ewe Lamb.
All peoples are concerned about their identity, but, with the Romanians, this issue has assumed special forms. The Romanians, inhabitants up to the modern age of two autonomous principalities, subjected to the Ottoman Gate, coveted by many other neighbors but living in the vast provinces occupied by the Hungarians, Austrians, Russians and Turks, lost among so many rapacious foreigners, were asked, even more than others, where they had come from and who they were. Eventually, however, all small peoples, struck by fate and left at the mercy of the great, have such concerns, sometimes transformed into true obsessions. (Ioan-Aurel Pop)

“Rodica Braga is a fully accomplished writer with equal access to several modes of literary expression. [...] The poems evolve in parallel to her fiction gravitating round the same hard core of analysis: the theme of passage. Rodica Braga’s poetry has its unmistakeable sound, balanced between modernity’s reflexive accents and the rhythms of postmodernity’s disenchantment.” (Irina Patras)

“Rodica Braga writes a somewhat special literature, with dramatic sounds, with vibrations of affection [...] which is but little practiced by Romanian poets and which we might call, borrowing a musical term, chamber literature. An inner oriented sort of poetry, but towards an interior of being, the soul breaking out into the tumultuous noise from the outside, capable of a fine recording, but with the finesse of a sentimental seismograph, which reacts to the earthquakes produced in the vital human soul by the implacable passage of time... “. “Here it is, in the words of Aura Christi, flowing abundantly, from hidden sources, the vivid stream of poetry, and let us not fear the rhetoric of capital letters – of great Poetry.”

(Nicolae Balotă)

Aura Christi impresses professional critics through extensively metaphorical diction, a frondist attitude, the perfect handling of set forms such as the classical sonnet an excellent command of poetic language and of the specific generic norms, means, a profound, meditative lyric in which the modernity and sensitivity of the century are mixed up with force and originality, through the subtle euphonic resonance, full of symbolic allusions and references images, joining the great torrent of the highly-pitched European lyric: Rimbaud and Baudelaire, Rilke and Blaga, Țveetaieva and Nichita Stănescu.” (Nicolae Breban)

Can you hear me, stranger? I’m reading your poems in the evening, keeping watch on a terrace, facing the hills of Jerusalem. I am not a good poetry commentator, those who wrote about your poetry “read” you very well, they have a force, a rare touch of the tragic, and a flair for transcendence, without falling (fortunately) into what goes by the name of “Religious poetry”. It is a heathen instinct that prevents you from the excessive “Christianization” of poetry, even in the Psalms.” (Fragment from a letter) Leon Volovici

Ignoring the rhetoric of an intolerant, metonymic postmodern poetry – grounded in the criterion of rhetoric, where a trope manages to impose a poetic model – Aura Christi continues to offer a metaphorical feast. The Psalm coexists with the harsh, expressionistic vision. The universe and language have tragic tensions, in poetic narratives which are both frustrating and fabulous, quasi-mythical. Death is a familiar presence, like gaze and olfaction itself. Myth is present as an self-reflexive game. The path to myth is a crossing of suffering. (Marian Victor Buciu)

“Writing about the apocalyptic fall is not easy. It is Aura Christi’s merit to have found the only solution to this fatal fall from the start: the one who writes it and “stops”, “inciting the righteous / the latter cold”. Only a sort of god of poetry, a newly discovered divinity conscious of breaking the myth, can resurrect the myth: the onset of “the future” is only possible through death. Resurrection is only possible because of it. The meaning of the greatest of the mysteries is thus paradoxically reversed by the overturning of the general negativity of meaning. (...) The discovery made by the poet is that the real itself has a poetic origin (not a real one) by falling into the “other hemisphere”, as if Dante himself were doing this in some other semantics: “Ah, the horse is always the son of the pegasus”. Phenomenal creatures have their origins in chimeras, and reality is embedded in the metaphor. (...) Another poetical “discovery”: the entire temporal myth of mankind can be reversed. (...) Here, then, how can the myth be recovered at a time when all postmodernists dream of demystification and disenchantment to get closer to the real as such.” (Stefania Mincu)

“Poor Nietzsche, the “blond beast,” was not spared crucifixion. Many prophets and saviors share in this fate: possibly in life, or after death. Nietzsche, the rebel against outdated laws, the gallant founder of a new “religion,” had to endure all possible failures and distortions, even the terrifying putting into practice of some of his ideas, which were no longer his and, in general, were no more ideas at all..... The “Cunning of Reason”, implicit in history, was described by Hegel, one of many whom Nietzsche did not like. Out of history and even beyond it, it is books that live on. In Gogol’s religious conception, the devil is the mystical essence and real being in which were concentrated God’s denial, and eternal evil. Gogol, as an artist of the laughing school, he studies the nature of this mystical essence; As a man, he fights against this real being: Gogol’s laughter is the fight of man with the devil. God is infinite, end and beginning of existence; The devil is the denial of God and, therefore, the denial of any beginning and end; The devil is the beginning and the unfinished that is given as beginning and infinite; The devil is the numbered means of existence, the denial of all depths and heights, eternal platitude, eternal triviality. The only object of Gogolian creation is the devil in this sense, that is, as a manifestation of the “immortal triviality of humanity” observed beyond all the conditions of time and space – of history, people, state, society – a manifestation of indisputable evil, Eternal and universal; – triviality sub specie aeternitatis – “under the appearance of eternity”. Here is a book which is mainly probing into Russian mentalities, which is the result of a multi-layered radiography of society, with emphasis upon the historical and the religious. (...) Sick Russia is written in the first years after the revolutionary events of 1905-1907, during which the author was personally involved, especially in placing this revolution under the sign of Christ. It is an important book precisely because it reflects the disillusionment of a passionate character, who always sets the deed in the center of history and religion. Of course, after the Soljenetz’s Archipelago, Merejkovsky’s pamphlets seem simple exercises in style, the “lack of freedom” condemned in them, or Tsarist Russia as a “prison of peoples” appearing now very close to what might be called the “rule of law”. When it comes to the “unmasking” of the horrors of contemporaneity, we can say – as Bolshevik decades have proved – that there is always something worse. (Emil Iordache)

Confession is a “phenomenology of the spirit”. It narrates the author’s breakdowns and his attempts at rebirth. It was meant to introduce the systematic dissociation of the truth from church dogma. Tolstoy frankly reveals his crisis and search up to the late 1970s. By his self-confrontation, he marks the dividing line between everything he had done that far, obsequious and false, according to his belief – and the supposed redeeming shore he thought to have reached for the rest of his life. It is the story of his lost and regained faith. (…) For the sake of truth, he engaged in the search for God. He alternated states of trust and despair. But he escaped the temptation of suicide. He came back, consciously, to his spontaneous trust in life, entertained from childhood. He understood the equivalence of God with life.

But a new problem arose: how to reconcile love for the working people, simply, with the church rituals that the people naturally fulfilled? He read Russian theological works. They were based on the dogma of the Church’s infallibility. He could not accept it. He could not recognize many other prescriptions, mysteries, symbols. He kept trying to humble himself. When after many years he joined in the Eucharistic mystery, he was barely able to swallow “blood” and “body” without feeling pofane. (Ion Ianoși)

An attractive aspect of this edition lies in its ability to be a pleasant and practical reading, while remaining a scientific document useful to both researchers and the general public. For specialists, the present book may represent a pleasant change of pace (from the usual study materials), which, however, does not rebute the scientific seriousness. Also, for both researchers and the general public, this book can be considered a way of demonstrating that, through an adequate presentation, what seems to be just a fad scientific text may prove to be, in fact, a lively, useful and relevant text for everyone. From now on you will be very careful when you read a newspaper, shop or listen to a political message. You will be horrified to find out that you are being manipulated 24 hours a day! Submission to an authority is a general human behavior resulting from the status of man’s social being. Often this behavior is the cause of manipulation attempts.

Synthesis of wealth literature dedicated to the subject over the past decades, the volume presents the techniques of influencing behavior in positive or negative terms. “The denunciation of a totalitarian regime is always welcome. Even it seems a bit late for that, it is important for the young generations of today and tomorrow to know the truth about those times. All the more important, as it was here that, judging by numbers and bestiality, the most terrible crimes in communist Europe were committed.” (Octav Bjoza)

“Such public denunciation will awaken collective memory (here and abroad), which is often in danger of being seized with amnesia. Youth, in particular, ought to find out in this formal way that the danger of a relapse into totalitarian of the communist variety will persist in the space dominated by it until recently” (Alexandru Zub)

“The “doctrinal” power of a denunciation of communism by the Romanian Parliament is even more effective than a presidential statement. It is therefore basic for parliament, and it is never too late. By its very nature, it would play a complementary role to the 2006 initiative or it will, perhaps, develop new ideas, filling in necessary details. Even so, things need not be presented by opposition to what happened eight years ago. It would be embarrassing and damaging if the two political actions collided instead of adding up to each other. It would not be unfamiliar with us, but it is not desirable.” (Gabriel Andreeescu)

“...To me, it seems very important that the information contained in the future document should address particularly the younger generations, that it should be integrated into the curriculum, with access to widely available national photo and video archives illustrating the presented document. Many young people do not have a fair picture of the reality of this criminal regime, and therefore we, society, need to ensure access to all this information. From a political perspective, I believe that this denunciation of communism should emphasize our attachment to the model of a democratic society.” (Călin Popescu Tăriceanu)

“I hope that Mr. Iliesiu’s appeal will have a social, not only political effect. Of course, there has already been a denunciation of communism, even if not by Parliament, and even if it is influenced by some partisan approaches. [...] It is never too late to remember the bad things in history, so as not to repeat them again. What is important, I repeat, are facts, more than symbolic decisions. For the Romanians, especially for the new generations, I think the most important thing is to understand why democracy is good, despite its flaws, why is market economy is good and why we should value freedom.” (Victor Ponta)

Collective antitotalitarian memory is essential for Romania’s future. We can reframe crimes, but in order for them to never be repeated, we must not forget them.” (Sorin Ilieșiu)

With discretion, but mercilessly, my friend Platon manages to penetrate human nature and feel the evil where no one would have thought it could hide.

Morning Hours is a book about the time given to him. This book comes from the past, but it belongs equally to the present and perhaps to the times that will come. A book for those who do not remove the present from a context which they have not chosen. At the same time, a text for those (few ?!) capable to understand that sending history like a beggar to court is, if not demagogy, then incurable stupidity.

All that I’m going to state in this essay cannot be accurately dealt with. In a sense, I do nothing but sabotage myself: I am a literary critic and historian, a literature instructor at the Faculty of Letters. I have, as they say, a “scientific career”. All that I will tell you below is against the tradition which begins with Mihail Dragomirescu of the “science of literature”. G. Calinescu took an ironic view of the positivist claims of those researchers who have the impression that they can extract the truth from a literary text as if it were gold from a mine. Literature cannot be dissected with scientific instruments. In that analysis, interpretation, literary hermeneutics uses rigorous methods, one makes use or erudition, but that is another story. No interpretation will reach the are Truth. Because the “truth” of literature is not one, it is a sum of many truths. Each of them depends on the reader, his intelligence, his culture and, last but not least, his sensitivity.” (Bogdan Crețu)

“I have a book, also a novel, still unpublished, that happens during the same period [Stalinist – nn], where I tempted an interesting experience: to use elements of my own biography of the same age, fifty, but... altering enormously the data and path of the main hero. The terrible age of those years contains, I think, an extraordinary and rich epic and human material, treated today by some commentators fleeing, polemical, and rarely unknowingly. Not only we, the young intellectuals, have been thrown out of history in a burning and turbulent boiler, but the entire Romanian society, occupied by the Soviet liberating tanks, has been forcefully put in front of so-called new values, and deny and slander their past, tradition and founders. Such historical crises and typhoons can sometimes show us another face of the nation, of our community, all the more so since in those years, and even in those decades, we, the Romanians, had the feeling of being have been forgotten or abandoned by our old allies who have been modeling us over time and have helped us to be a state structured on democratic principles. Though Paul kept away from the political upheaval of those years – the beginning of Stalinism – he was sufficiently perspicuous and well-endowed with the sense of irony so as not to completely circumvent both the temptations and the highly parallel suggestions and imitations of the clichés of the times, in language and in his head. In my own way, I write a kind of contemporary history! Paul said as playful as a child, amusing himself in his head, his forms of rest and adult holiday, according to his own expressions. This irony of another contemporary history became for him, Paul, first, and then later, after extensive convulsions, and for the members of the Circle, an increasingly serious reality. History, if it exists, as science or art, as you wish, is almost never unique. Alone, like a church quiver. She, the official at least, throws her powerful shadows through all the realities. Or it simply paves the way for another, which tends to deny the public, accepted, clammy. And that sometimes comes out like a modest and stubborn water, a phreatic cloth, endowed with a single genius or luck, on the surface, that is, it becomes itself, from the anonymous, the underground, the impostor, etc., the real one. The real one! Please, for another generation or for a while. What time?! Who could say… (Nicolae Breban)

“It has four spinning wheels, two or three foot pedals, a gearshift that uses both a hand and a steering wheel. What is so hard to understand? “That we are so ignorant that even the sun escapes our sight. Or are we so narrow-minded that we would not even react even to a stone thrown between our eyes. Or are we so arrogant and complacent that even while queuing for bread or in the

This is a new philological research on the evolution of the psalm literary subspecies in Romanian literature (after that of Al. Andriescu) whose history includes names from 17th century Dosoftei to 20th century Arghezi, which are also the most important names that come to mind in this context A lot and intelligently has been written in this generic tradition in Romania, either of the documentary or speculative sort. Obviously, the Romanian Psalm is not limited to the psalm itself, as a literary species; one needs a new theoretical discussion for definition and history. It is not the old history of the psalm (elucidated, to a great extent) that feels problematic, but the newer, modern and postmodern history. The pleasant surprise caused by Anca Tomoioaga’s book is that modern and postmodern poets felt the need to reconnect to the religious tradition of the psalm, in a context that would seem unfavorable, such as that of the 20th century and of the beginning of the third millennium. This symptomatic recovery is a major issue worth discussing in a wider cultural context, and Anca Tomoioaga assumes this interrogation. (Ion Simuț)

Cristian Țopescu’s comments with the final dream tour of the Romanian national made me want one thing: to become a commentator and watch unforgettable matches. That’s how I graduated from the Upper School of Journalism in 2003, a year in which I realized a first dream: to commemorate a live football match. It happens at TV Sport, the current sport.ro. Game, Arsenal – Everton 2-0. Since then we have gathered more than 1,700 commented games, either from the studio or from the stadium. Among them, two finals of the Champions League, some of the most anticipated derby in Europe, Barcelona
Inevitably, when you are in such a situation, you have to face the critics and the bitterest swear words. I know my South American volcanic style does not please everybody, but I think it suits me best. I think a commentator has to convey the excitement and passion during a match just to make the viewer feel like he is on the stadium. The point is that no one leaves my comments indifferent. They either like it, or not! (Bogdan Socol)

This paper approaches a European reality that is still unresolved: migration. It is a phenomenon facing almost all peoples of the world, its effects marking society either from the perspective of those who leave a country, or from the perspective of those who come to a country. Personally, I have experienced migration as living between two worlds, worlds as two parts of oneself that cannot be united into a whole.

This book offers an insight into the life of the migrant, with his motivation, his world in the country left behind and his world in the country of destination, the effects and changes that this phenomenon works on an individual and at the social level. It is an inroad into Western realities, where migrants try to survive discrimination and humiliation. It is the experience of return, back to he seasons and Romanian eternities.

Drawing the line, we would say that we are in the presence of a pertinent high-level approach, of a precious work instrument meant to fill a gap in the specialized didactic-scientific literature, but also useful for intellectual circles interested in the evolution of the Russian poetic phenomenon in the 20th century, located outside the academic community. (Mircea Croitoru)
Not even the most radical avant-gardists could completely ignore tradition, although, theoretically, they claimed to have cast it off as garbage. Urmuz capitalized on the absurd in folklore, but not in Caragiale. “Constructivists” felt the temptation to assimilate Brancusi to avant-garde, etc. However, postmodernists have reached the absurd conclusion that they stand at the origin of the world. Liviu Rebreanu is considered so “obsolete” as to no longer justify inclusion in the canon or school curriculum. Not to mention Eminescu. He is only a writer of historical importance, interesting, at most, through some parodic-textual poems, as argued by an “eminent” literary historian who believes that his place in the Romanian literary canon must be given to postmodernist Mircea Cărtărescu. The deposition of the “national poet” was done in the name of his being “obsolete”. The captatio benevolentiae from one of Aura Cristi’s conference papers begins with such a challenge: “I wondered more than once, over the last few years, what would happen if someday we were to face Michael (Or Mihail, as Nichita Stănescu) Eminescu, Lucian Blaga or Nicolae Iorga, George Călinescu or Liviu Rebreanu, Titu Maiorescu or one of the great ladies of Romanian literature, Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu? Would they feel at home? Here, among us, the Romanian writers… These questions would undoubtedly stir up the ironic or sarcastic comments of many postmodernists, textualists, dromaists or post-post-modernists, who, in a hurry, produced “a new table of accepted values”, “because the notion of culture is ..” politically suspect!” Of course, these great writers would no longer feel at home, but abandoned in their homeland in the name of another, obscure, vulgar hybrid, as an Mircea Eliade predicted in his famous 1953 conference, “Destiny of Romanian Culture”. The accelerated globalization of the current world brings not only advantages that we are currently talking about, but also disadvantages, which are more or less obvious. In this volume, the author addresses, from a critical perspective, not only aspects of globalization but also many other topical and general themes. These are short texts, often written in an ironic or humorous tone, a hybrid genus oscillating between journalism and literature, as widely practiced in Western countries. But not only. Romanian literature has an old tradition in this field, starting with Tudor Arghezi’s tablets, continuing with Geo Bogza’s glosses, down to contemporary Tudor Octavian. The volume – a bitter panorama of the contemporary world – offers the reader a light, often amusing, reading, and not rarely, information on less known facts and issues.

The man who had just crossed the border in July 1873 was a dead man, and the police did not know that. He was dead in the face of threats, blackmail, machinations, plotting. A dead man who would make love within eight days. In exile, in Switzerland, Gustave Courbet gave himself to the greatest pleasures of his life: he painted, had fun, bathed in rivers and lakes. We marvel at the freedom of this body, leaving its trace along the streets, the narrow streets of the small city, of this enormous belly gently working its way into the waters, valleys, forests. When he paints, Courbet clogs his face in nature, his eyes, his lips, his nose, his two hands, assuming the risk of wandering, and especially the risk of being fascinated, blinded, ravaged, freed of himself. What secrecy surrounds the years of La Tour-de-Peilz, on the shores of Lake Leman, these four years which specialists usually sum up in two cruel phrases: Courbet does not paint anything good and dies because of too much drink? This secret, tested by the fire of the Paris Commune, is the contagious joy of the man who is his own master. (David Bosc)

Jidi Majia is undoubtedly a poet of the four elements – grown in the Dalingshan Mountains, Southwest of Sichuan province, among members of the Nuosu tribe, a branch of ethnic Yi. He knows from within the aboriginal culture in which people maintain an almost reverential relationship with nature, especially when compared to Westerners, whose thinking was modeled by the Enlightenment. Ethnic Yi do not share the views of encyclopedists, who celebrate the triumph of rationality and the so-called disappearance of magic. Undoubtedly, this profane goddess called Reason is wrong when she considers people, not as ordinary inhabitants of the world, like all others, but as conquerors who have the right to obey impostors, despise minerals and destroy forests. When Jidi Majia speaks – in poetry or essays – about his love for the earth, the majestic views of childhood, or the sovereignty of wild nature inhabited by invisible forces, you can only think of the nomad, the wanderer Antonin Artaud. (Françoise Roy)

Jidi Majia’s works are motifs embedded in the tapestry of cultural traditions inherited from his Nuosu clan, the Yi tribe. They create an image of a time-honoured aspiration to progress and self-sufficiency, not being able to create a rupture with the past, but to connect to the roots of ethnic spirituality. The portrait they project is that of a man who is in love with indigenous knowledge and wisdom, despite Majia’s prominent status as citizen of the world. (Zolani Mkiva)

The present novel combines realism with fairy tales and utopia, the concrete reality of the facts with the impalpable reality of consciousness and imagination. An episode from the recent history of Romania – from 1940, the year of the great territorial races at all the cardinal points of the borders of Great Romania, and the year 1989, the year of the Revolution – is connected in a parallel history, on two levels, with the history of the ancient Dacians.

The essays contained in this book are connected through some topics that have concerned me: rationality, values and freedom. Some of the articles appeared in different publications, others saw the print light through this book. I tried to bring to public consciousness some important Romanian thinkers who emerged into the Romanian cultural space but threatened now by the shadow of oblivion. Their work is done largely in the interwar period, in a climate of freedom, without ideological or other pressure, being the result of intellectual power and personal culture. After 1946 the Communist regime progressively restricted political freedoms, tried to destroy the so-called bourgeois cultural traditions, exerting repression on intellectuals and writers. The domain of social sciences was affected by an inquisitorial censorship, banning authors and works considered to be dangerous to Romanian society and Marxist ideology.

The tendency of inflating local values is exposed to dangers. In particular, the accusations of “protoconism”, of ethnocentrism, of “pro domo biases”, of provincialism or of “clocher esprit”, of ignoring the world map of the evolutions in the area – accusations which, indeed, can be either motivated or unfounded: the criterion is a matter of relativization and dosing, of procedures endowed with a very weak consensual vocation. As I mentioned on some other occasion – speaking of D. Țepeneag’s novels, which we do not deem inferior to those of the Nobel Award winner Claude Simon – we are running the risk of playing back the “Notre grand Arghiropoulos” syndrome, ridiculed (with some sympathy, however!) by E. Lovinescu in Aquaforte. Nevertheless, while trying to avoid that risk, we are exposing ourselves to another: to underestimate, despite evidence, a number, not by far a small one, of undeniable personalities in our post-war literature. After an odyssey of exile and self-estrangement, deployed in his novel The Barrier, Emil Rațiu published a narrative of praise, Master Mason Manole, a novel whose object is a life of creation. Unlike the legendary Mason Manole, modern man no longer exalts a building dedicated to Allmighty God, but one dedicated to himself, sacrificing to a new deity, Freedom, the loved ones, and ultimately unknowingly sacrificing himself. The novel reports from an ideal point of view the life of the contemporary hero of the novel, associated with the life of the legendary builder, to reveal the profound meaning of his life. The first level of reading, of the sequence of facts experienced by the contemporary hero, catches the reader’s attention as a “detective novel”. He does not remain at the first level of reading, but analyzes the profound meaning of existence, of the love-sacrifice, the life-death ratio that underwrites the ethos of the popular creator of the ballad.

The parallel between everyday life and myth, in extreme situations of suspense, through which the hero of the novel passes, highlights the connection between sacrifice and creation, death and life, necessary to any accomplishment that endures. Suspended above a chasm, in choosing between the sacrifice of his own life and the sacrifice of another life, the hero of the novel, after many dramatic attempts, collapses from the scaffolding of his own life, with “shingle wings”, like the legendary craftsman. Bringing the archetype in the proximity of the present time to redeem deeds which otherwise would remain without echo, as he had done in a previous novel modelled on another national myth, The Ewe Lamb, Emil Petru Rațiu, addresses and explores a major theme in Master Mason Manole as well.

These stories were written between 2010-2014 and partly published in periodical papers. We called them parables as they were underwritten with a certain intentionality, and, in writing them down, I applied the same four-part structure and the same quantitative register (approximately one thousand words).

The ones in The Souls’ Guides (the first section) are European, and their action takes place in different locations on the old continent and most of the ideas came to me during my wanderings (love, books, music and travel are, I think, the most beautiful things that can happen to us in a lifetime). Except for the first and the last pieces, which outline a possible frame, the order of the stories is alphabetical. Though thought of as fantastic, they also have an experimental dimension, at the same time they can also be read as poems in prose: the cities through which we have passed, the people I have known and, of course, my soul, somewhere, in my depths, considering me, like many of my kind, somewhat poet... Nietzsche on classical philology – here is a really fascinating subject, a unique reward for the amateur to pursue the fascinating show of the progress to self-knowledge. For, in fact, Nietzsche is writing about himself, and in this respect he even claims his own territory. Philologists are people allergic to the infirmity of the modern man that causes him to use sentiments in order to earn money and bread. Not just any hypostasis, but an essential one. Cosmoza, demonstrată aproape matematic într-o construcţie originală, este drumul sacru al împlinirii. Iubirea cosmică e ideea de raport între Dumnezeu şi lume, un raport întemeiat pe compatibilitate şi justificat prin deosebire. Fără ea, creaţia s-ar destrăma. Cu ea, cele depărtate se apropie, se unesc, se înalță și devin asemenea. Un parcurs temerar al gândului între generarea, degenerarea și regenerarea noastră.

Cosmosis, almost mathematically demonstrated in an original construction, is the sacred road of fulfillment. Cosmic love is the idea of a relationship between God and the world, a relationship based on compatibility and justified by difference. Without it, creation would break apart. With it, the distant ones draw near, unite, ascend and become alike. A daring mental journey from our generation, to degeneration, and onward to regeneration.

“This book falls into the series of preliminary publishing events that foreshadow a political history of post-war Romanian literature. It is not a “war with aesthetics”, haunted by Marxist Ion Dobrogeanu Gherea’s critical ghost, but aesthetical reevaluations that employ the literary critical acquisitions; and, of course, recontextualizations (interrogating important issues of our age), taking into account, however, the shifts in reception and the capricious political meteorology. In fact, we are consistent with the program, announced from its onset (The Horizon of Reading, 1983), considering that, from a sociological point of view, we cannot examine the literary phenomenon while cutting its historical navel.

The Orphaned Generation discusses, through essays in representative authors, a creative generation, having as a common denominator the formative conditions; it was shaped by interdictions (clandestine reading, “hidden” masters, purged libraries), which caused a polemic reaction (rupture) promoting a negative program from the start. But, at the same time, it was an augural generation, having the role of a link, rediscovering – euphorically – the modernist tradition, engaging, through creative combustion, in a common recuperating, fertile, critically sustained kind of writing, benefiting from “tactical” reviews, as critic Matei Calinescu admitted. Even though we are only talking about poets in this book, it was not just a generation of poets, carrying with them the Labis legend, announcing, in young voices, a new era of lyricism. It is not, therefore, “team” of poets, but a group of personalities, with distinct voices, evolving in unpredictable directions, breeding, in time, dissensions, heated controversies, getting into provisional hierarchies. The book provides a thematic inventory, defining a generation’s specificity.” (Adrian Dinu Rachieru)

The book is like a play with its cast of characters, the author’s parentheses, dialogues, sequences, scenes, acts, with the necessary connection between them. As a chance remark, criticism may live as long as the object text if it has enough force and writerly quality. These are optimistic thoughts in the age of the Internet, which, for the time being, does not have the power of critical control, nor are there any chances of this kind. That is why the danger of the disappearance of print culture sounds as remote as a rare cataclysm. We also believe in something else. It is certain that for critical interpretation to be as close as possible to the text, it needs to be associated with the “aesthetic aspect” of the approach, which concerns wording and phrasing, quoting, describing, and so forth. Although fuelled by the author’s relativistic attitude in the process of creation, this version of the plot affirms Akunin’s authorial right when reinterpreting Shakespearean Hamlet or Chekhov’s “Seagull” with the sensitivity and skill of a playwright who speaks fluent Russian as a native language, and who is of course aware of other ingenious textual possibilities to rewrite famous precedents. Demonstrating that he can accomplish more than a copy of Hamlet, as Stoppard also managed to do in Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead, Akunin produces a play with new dramatic valences. Although the Hamlet pattern is recognoscible, the new version breathes new life into it, giving it a contemporary meaning, enriched by a polyvalent association with the Chekhovian Seagull. Dr. Dorn, the philanderer and globetrotter who brings Treplev back to life from his suicidal attempts before shooting him, appears as an unexpected descendant of a Horatio extremely different from the contemplative philosopher of Shakespearean Hamlet. By establishing links between the cultures of Europe, Dr. Dorn and Horatio offer the audience a new opportunity to explore the imaginative potential of the Shakespeare and Chekhov worlds in a theatrical encounter cast in the detectivist genre. What does Constantin Lupeanu and his collaborator offer us this time? The first Romanian version of a volume of lyrics signed by a contemporary Chinese poet. Even if I do not speak Chinese (more precisely, any of its dialects), I know quite well the “poetic language”, which I learned from Nichita Stanescu and other great Romanian poets. I can say, therefore, knowingly that the texts resulting from the rewriting of Jidi Majia’s poems in Romanian are full of grace and delicacy (of “infinite delicacy”, as Emil Brumaru would say). As any other authentic poet, Jidi Majia does not find it compromising to be sentimental: “On a charming evening, she said,” I lost the embroidery needle / Come quickly / Help me find it. (I searched for it the whole path) /.../ In a heavy twilight / I said to her: / What has deeply fallen into my heart / Is it not your embroidery needle? “ We also have proof that emotion has not gone away from the world (as authors incapable of producing emotion would claim). That eventually poetry is emotion in its essence, which, in fact, secures its universality. Even if we do not understand the Chinese writing, we understand the tears streaming down the cheek of a Chinese when he is away from his beloved. (Alex Stefanescu)

This is the title of a novel which deserves to be included in school textbooks: The Refugees by Ion Lazu. This novel means a new territory for our literature, but it also means a landmark in Romanian post-war fiction, not only in post-’89 fiction. It stands out by its remarkable stylistic merits. This literary work collapses an autobiographical plot and an interesting narrative experiment. It is an emblematic novel for the twentieth century, because the figure of the refugee is itself emblematic for this century... „Chipul cotropit pe partea dreaptă de urmăriile unei intervenții chirurgicale păstrează, în mare, farmecul și dărzenia. Părul strâns în creștet și barba abundantă te-ar trimite cu gândul la marii pontifi hiperboreeni sau la preoții taoiști, dacă vioiciunea și gesticulația nu te-ar opri la timp. Știe multe, dar mărturisește puține. Viața l-a făcut prudent. Cine îi va dezvălui spiritul profund? Poetul și savantul nu au făcut niciodată concesii. Nici omul nu are pe conștiință fapte grandiose-regretabile, deși a stat sub vremi, iar ideologia marxistă i-a făcut pe mulți să-și ascundă spiritul critic.” (Gheorghe Postelnicu)

“The face invaded on the right side by the effects of a surgical intervention has broadly preserved its charm and audacity. His hair and abundant beard would set you thinking with the thought of the great Hyperborean Pontiffs or Taoist priests if the liveliness and gesticulation did not stop you in time. He knows a lot, but confesses little. Life made him cautious. Who will reveal its profound spirit? The poet and the scholar have never made concessions. Even man has no conscientious and grand-deeds, though he has stayed under time, and Marxist ideology has made many to hide his critical spirit.
The card D. Țepeneag played from the start was that of the vanguard. It was only natural that he should have started at it in Bucharest at a time of strange, unexpected and cunning political experiment in liberal-national-communism that saw the rebirth of Romanian literature out of the realist-socialist ashes. In the Paris of 1971 he got acquainted with a new artistic world which confronted him with different and not at all encouraging difficulties. The examples of Tzara, Isou, Ionesco cannot be played back and they only offer consolation. It is not easy to convince a world where too many experiments had eventually been confiscated by tradition. Paris, France, and Jarry’s language are forever disenchanted with imported aesthetic scandals. Their internal production will do, it is even in excess. Those were hard times for the Paris avant-garde, depriving them of glory. (Marian Victor Buciu)

“Aura Christi’ poetries was formed and shaped with a bold and rare gravity of tone in a short time. It is primarily atuned to the post-romantic poetry of meditation, from Rilke to Tveetaieva, from Blaga to Nichita Stănescu. Not yielding to the post-December 1989 cultural and monumental temptations, among which the so-called Romanian post-modernism, which displays the refusal of classical and modern values in favor of a broken and sometimes barbarian patched-up improvisation, under the excuse of authenticity, our poet impresses professional critics through extensively metaphorical diction, a frondist attitude, the perfect handling of set forms such as the classical sonnet an excellent command of poetic language and of the specific generic norms, means, a profound, meditative lyric in which the modernity and sensitivity of the century are mixed up with force and originality, through the subtle euphonic resonance, full of symbolic allusions and references images, joining the great torrent of the highly-pitched European lyric: Rimbaud and Baudelaire, Rilke and Blaga, Tveetaieva and Nichita Stănescu.” (Nicolae Breban)
“Writing about the apocalyptic fall is not easy. It is Aura Christi’s merit to have found the only solution to this fatal fall from the start: the one who writes it and “stops”, “inciting the righteous / the latter cold”. Only a sort of god of poetry, a newly discovered divinity conscious of breaking myth can resurrect myth: the onset of “the future” is only possible through death. Resurrection is only possible because of it. The meaning of the greatest of the mysteries is thus paradoxically reversed by the overturning of the general negativity of meaning. (…) The discovery made by the poet is that the real itself has a poetic origin (not a real one) by falling into the “other hemisphere”, as if Dante himself were doing this in some other semantics: “Ah, the horse is always the son of the pegasus”. Phenomenal creatures have their origins in chimeras, and reality is embedded in the metaphor. (…) Another poetical “discovery”: the entire temporal myth of mankind can be reversed. (…) Here, then, how can the myth be recovered at a time when all postmodernists dream of demystification and disenchantment to get closer to the real as such.” (Stefania Mincu)

The first volume of d’Arzac’s Dragons of the Apocalypse is the saga of a world in which people, dragons and vampires live together. The saga ends up with the rise of the Dragon-Man. Lor and Dragon Nita have a common soul. Their relationship is more than brotherhood, it is the most sacred union that there can be. The atmospheric narrative opens the gates of the imagination towards a world which lets the reader in hypnotising him and holding him prisoner. Open the door and enter a new world, different from the one you have known so far or imagined. Gradually you will recognize the places where the adventure sets off.

At a shallow look, one might say that Dea Loher writes detectivist or horror literature. Almost there is none among the texts she authored that does not involve at least one murder. Sometimes we are dealing with serial killers, as in Blue Beard – Women’s Hope At other times, murder is unbearably violent, as in Life on the Praça Roosevelt. Far from producing consumer literature, Dea Loher is one of the great names of contemporary drama. Harsh, and, at the same time, poetic, her drama is blacker, perhaps, than that of Beckett. In her world, which is ours, Good has no chance, even when it’s written in small letters. It is always destroyed, whether it takes the form of love, generosity, or hope! Or, at least, (such little) happiness. There is always a mechanism of overwhelming force (the ancients would have called it Fate) that acts against goodness, ending up in tragedy. Several of her plays have also got into our repertoire: Foreign House (Ariel Theater Târgu Mureș, directed by Alexandar Ivanovski), Blue Beard – Women’s Hope (Act Theater, Studio Toaca – Bucharest, directed by Alexandra Badea), Adam Geist Brăila, directed by Radu Afrim) and Life on the Praça Roosevelt (Timișoara National Theater, directed by Radu Afrim). This volume contains ten of the author’s most frequently performed plays.

Today we live the reverse of the Edenic world described in the opening of the “The Ewe Lamb” ballad: the world has ceased to be a “mouth of heaven,” being transformed into an increasingly mercantile and vulnerable world, whose characteristics are homogenization, the disappearance of differences, of genders, of good and evil, the immersion into the “global village”. The virtual world empties out reality, replacing it with “emotions” dosen by others, in an attempt to depersonalize and straightjacket people’s minds.

“I have noticed that the great literature has not been written after 1989 by those who won the power in culture under the victorious label of postmodernism, but by lonely writers, regardless of generation, regardless of whether they had been placed beyond “expiry date”. Nicolae Breban, from the very beginning of the era, published one of the great books of modern and transmodern Romanian literature, almost a book of wills. (...) The Only Way is one of the most critical books ever written, the masterpiece-synthesis of Nicholas Breban’s work, supported by an exceptional narrative tension. (...) The Only Way is one of the great transmodern novels in cynical / kynic key.” (Theodor Codreanu)

“I think a great writer such as Nicolae Breban deserves much more attention than he has received in the last twenty years, when he stubbornly did what he had always done, no matter at what age and irrespective of his social status: to write. Like any great creator, Breban always had the power to establish normality by the yardstick of his writing.” (Bogdan Cretu)

“Nicolae Breban, born in 1934, continues, from his literary debut in 1957 and from the publication of his first novel, Francesca, in 1965, to be a top presence in contemporary Romanian literature. (...) The author of so many volumes also proved a singular civic courage when, two years after his election, exclusively for cultural merit, as a deputy member of the Central Committee of the Romanian Communist Party (August 1969), he publicly condemned the Ceausescu regime in Paris for the dogmatic cultural theses of July 1971. On that occasion, he resigned from the post of editor-in-chief of the main literary literary magazine Literary Romania. He nevertheless refused exile and returned to Romania, facing the consequences of his dissenting acts in the name of a free writer’s consciousness... “(Ion Ianoşi)

“N. Breban is one of the great novelists of Romanian literature ever, the most important of our contemporary novelists, synchronous, through the forms and substance of fiction, with the most significant representatives of contemporary world literature “. (Marian Victor Buciu)

“In a deeply articulated culture, ideas send out echoes. Turgenev’s antinomy was brilliantly confirmed by the art of the following decades, in an essential typological polarization, confirmed precisely by his unfaithful opponent. The “idiot” Mskkin, Makar Ivanovici Dolgoruki or Aleoasa Karamazov are hypostases of a Russian Don Quixote, and under the same circumstances does Hamlet assume the image of “underground man,” Raskolnikov, Ippolit, Stavroghin, Versilov, Ivan Karamazov. Hamlet has healthy or morbid descendents. The diagnosis of the latter is Dostoevsky’s constant obsession. He brilliantly identified the dissolute analytical spirit, selfishness, cynicism, coldness, skepticism and indifference, prophetically predicting the covenant of a twentieth-century intellectual with the devil. To this sick Hamlet of the modern age we have dedicated several studies...” (Ion Ianoşi)

“Beginning with Master Thomas’s Garden (1995), which represents his editorial debut, Borbély is recommended as a critic free from local biases and fixations, uninhibited by endemic complexes and endowed with a hermeneutical opening where the main creative references seem to be German ones (Nietzsche, Freud, Jung, Kafka, Hermann Hesse and Thomas Mann). His PhD thesis, From Hercules to Eulenspiegel. The Heroic (published as a book in 2001) manages to overcome the handicap of post-war criticism which remains enclosed within a provincialist horizon of expectations, unable to get in touch with critical ideas elsewhere, and synchronize normally with the approach of interdisciplinarity. The comparative opening, as well as the appetite for the Nietzschean experience of ideas make Stefan Borbély a complex critical personality. He is a phenomenologist of the Mircea Eliade school interested in the auroral topology of humanity including the heroic category out of which the foundations of Mediterranean culture and civilization can be inferred. A well-known scholar and anthropologist, Stefan Borbély is an important example of the integration of our post-December 1989 criticism in the sphere of European hermeneutics.” (Marin Mincu, 2009)

“The first edition of Lev Tolstoy’s Diary came out from the Univers Publishing House in two volumes (in 1975 and 1976 – volume I: 1847-1895, volume II: 1896-1910), including “Letters, Memoirs, Diaries”. The translation was done by Janina Ianoşi, while the preface, chronological table, notes and comments were contributed by Ion Ianoşi. This edition was a selection of the full text of the Russian academic edition Polnoe sobranie socinenii (iubileinoe izdanie) – Complete Works (Jubilee Edition). Out of the volumes 1-90 (Moscow-Leningrad, 1928-1958), we used the thirteen diary volumes, 46-58 (which appeared between 1934 and 1958). I also consulted an edition of Works in twenty volumes (since 1965) – volumes 19 and 20. In choosing the texts, I took into consideration the becoming of the overwhelming personality of the great writer, as well as the interests of the Romanian reader.

The second edition was brought out by the Elit Publishing House (printed, without specifying the date, in 2000). It was succeeded, with some deletions and some completions, by the original version on the basis of the confrontation of texts with those present in a subsequent Russian selection in twenty-two volumes, Sobranie socinenii v dvadtsatii dvux tomah (Moscow, 1985) in twenty-two volumes, volumes 21 and 22. We found on this occasion coincidence between most of the texts originally selected by us and the text of that Russian edition, but also some differences: there are present either larger “theoretical” passages or others with a recognizable background only by local readers familiar with the weather environment – instead, biographical details are considered to be too intimate (especially erotic, generally related to bodily, health or illness) while many social hints are considered by the Russian publisher as undesirable because of their critical edge (especially the ones on the revolution, Marxism, socialism). As far as we are concerned, we kept both, but we did not want – with rare exceptions – to load our selection with long exposures, which in any case vary widely. The remembered Russian edition has served us rather to supplement the accuracy we have been trying to prove since the seventies of the last century.

A novel inspired by contemporary history, Puzzle takes a comprehensive view of the Romanians’ vocation to harmonize in a mysterious way with the other European countries (Constantin Noica) reconciling two historically opposite mentalities: Oriental and Western. At the heart of the book is a single person – retired teacher Neghibaur – around whom facts and people are placed like a screen of the imagination, observation and experience of the former teacher. Of a dense and solid construction, the novel is also remarkable for the opening and depth of the hidden mechanisms of individual reactions triggered by the important social changes that occurred in the country’s life after the Revolution of December 1989.

Florin Logreșteanu (the pseudonym of Radu Scorojitu) was born on 14 May 1948 in the city of Sibiu. Given the specifics of his father’s profession, he followed his family through several towns in the country until 1960, when he settled in Craiova. Here he completed the high school and university studies at the Faculty of Philology, graduated in 1972. He works as a professor of literature at the National Colleges Nicolae Titulescu and Elena Cuza in Cetatea Băniei, as a school inspector in Dolj county and periodically teaches Romanian at the Faculty of Letters of the University of Craiova. In 1984 he got his degree of Doctor of Philology at the Center for Ethnological and Dialecological Research in Bucharest, writing on Medical Population Terminology, Polisemantics and Expressivity. Since 1993 he has been a member of the Romanian Writers’ Union.
Debut: 1974, in the Luceafărul magazine, with a sketch, “Balance Swing”, on the recommendation of literary critic S. Damian and prose writer Nicolae Velea. Editorial debut: The Birds’ Crossing, Short Stories, Albatros Publishing House, Bucharest. At the suggestion of the director of the publishing house, Mircea Sântimbreanu, he got his pen name, Florin Logreșteanu. Books: Steps, Romanian, Cartea Românească Publishing

His writing is dense, robust and analytical in the best traditional way. His stories have passionate, social, even political, conflicts in their dynamics, proposing living characters with beautiful profiles drawn in thick bolds and farms, cultivating a polemic and always engaging dialogue. (…)

In other words, Mircea Ioan Casimcea is a complex writer (if we add that besides the volumes of prose – stories, novels, and novels – he also ventured into lyrical, journalistic and even exegetic territory literary, with the books on the table in each of these areas), a writer with a literary biography that I can assume with all my justification as the work of a consciousness that can express itself in the Agora directly without hesitation in its own way to cultivate the verb, so original. This volume proves this to be so great, so my few introductory lines, not to be an analytical exercise, are to draw the attention of the reader to the fact that he has taken up a book on which he deserves to stand and reflect with usefulness… (Constantin Cubleşan)

The structure of the book is a balanced one and perfectly suited to the goals and directions of research pursued by the authors. Like any beginning in some thematic field, the book is not to be considered infallible, being susceptible to amendments, additions and updates. What counts most is the fact that knowledge of the critical situation in respect to terrorism is likely to impose the subject among those of permanent concern for the structures and the military to whom society has entrusted this mission. In the near future, it will be increasingly difficult to draw a clear line between domestic and transnational or international terrorism, as more and more terrorist groups act transnationally and are able to move quickly from one region to another. For Romania, the country facing low risk in terms of terrorist attacks, the responsibility of policy-makers is to ensure that such an event can be effectively managed.

Here is a book that breaks the so long and prestigious tradition of the novel, which has always been “deterministic”. In life, the chain of caustics and effects continues to crumble. We enter beyond the world called “reality”, the palpable world, the world of matter, which will appear to us as an appearance. Even the characters’ identity fluctuates. The name, because it belongs to a creature of flesh and bones, materials, is no longer but an appearance of being. That is how we will enter the other side of our existence, into a universe I suspected, but where I could not reach so far, beyond what we see with our eyes. We will cross this threshold, we will cross beyond the Gate. But where did this disturbing adventure start? The Life of Life Continues is a cry against death, the epic of our civilization unable to overcome death. The novelist Dan Perşa ventured to go this way, bringing the power of dreaming, the transfigurative psychic energies, the art of the word. Big stack, singular artistic sensitivity, infiltrated composition of mythical heres. This creates a “novel” that goes beyond “literature.” An incredible story, that of going beyond literature. Is it possible that a study of philosopher Constantin Noica – that sets itself high standards worthy of our appreciation – should be written by one of the literati? Noica has the reputation of a hard philosopher, and, moreover, he literally denied literature, considering it somewhat frivolous. Maybe writers too. Therefore, the enterprise is bound to appear risky or even insolent. Despite all that, Dorin Popescu, the author of the book, a graduate of philological studies, is an expert in more than what is commonly called “literature”. On the other hand, Constantin Noica does not emerge from his book as straightjacketed and immersed in prejudices as usual. In other words, Constantin Noica is no longer the Constantin Noica known from treatises of Romanian philosophy. (Mircea A. Diaconu)

How many of Frank Wedekind’s contemporaries would have thought that the author who scandalized them so many times, both in his lifestyle (he also knew the experience of detention) and in his insistence on bringing the taboo themes of the time – especially sexuality – would remain in history as one of the great playwrights of the world? Thanks to the modernity and strength of Wedekind’s vision, the songs that shocked the censors and the audience of the late nineteenth century are today part of the great universal repertoire. There is no country where texts such as The Awakening of Spring or Lulu (the famous tragedy of the Earth Spirit and Pandora’s Box) are not periodically staged by great directors. Three years ago it was Romanian stage director Silviu Purcarete who mounted a memorable performance. This volume includes, in a new translation, the most famous dramatic texts of the great German writer: Springtime, Earth Spirit, Pandora’s Box, Tenor and Marquis von Keith. (Victor Scoradet)

Frank (actually, Benjamin Franklin) Wedekind was born on 24 July 1864 in Hannover. After the founding, in 1871, of the empire whose professed opponent he was, his father, doctor Friedrich Wilhelm Wedekind, decided to move with his family to Switzerland. Because of school difficulties, since 1881 Frank Wedekind receives private lessons, and three years later took his baccalaureate. At the same age he publishes his first literary attempts. After a semester of studying French Literature in Lausanne, he followed his father’s advice and moved to Munich where he began his law studies. He wrote poems, fiction, and a comedy. In 1886 there was a definitive break up with the father, who, dissatisfied with Frank’s results at college, cut out any material support. That obliged the young writer to work for Maggi & co, the advertising and press service. After the death of his father (1888) he moved to Munich, where he approached the circle of naturalist writers. In 1891 he finished the Awakening of Spring, a play. He travelled to Paris, London, Zurich and Berlin. In 1895, a publishing house in Munich published a new play: The Spirit of the Earth, a tragedy. A year later he founded the Simplicissimus magazine, where he publishes under various pseudonyms. At the same time he started a relationship with Frida Strindberg, none other than the great Scandinavian playwright’s wife – a relationship from which one year later her first son was born: Friedrich Strindberg-Wedekind. In 1898 The Spirit of the Earth was performed in Leipzig. Being chased for a satirical onslaught on the Emperor, he ran to Switzerland. The following year he returned to Germany, hoping the incident had been forgotten. He was arrested and detained for six months in Königstein. In 1901 he became a father again, the mother of his second son being the family maid. Between 1902-1908 he was a cabaret player and actor, especially in performances with his own songs. In 1904 he saw the staging of his Pandora’s Box. The volume including that play was confiscated by censorship for immorality. It would take a court of justice two years to pronounce the editors and the author innocent. In 1906 Wedekind married actress Tilly Newes, from whom he would have two daughters. In 1906 The Awakening of Spring was staged in Berlin by famous Max Reinhardt. Frank Wedekind was the most often performed playwright of the time. There were other premiers of plays which reinforced the writer’s celebrity. The beginning of the Second World War was the occasion for Wedekind’s nationalistic speech entitled “Germany will bring freedom”. He died in Munich on the 9th of March, 1918.

Here are the best known of his works: Kinder und Narren (Children and Fools), 1890; Frühlings Erwachen, 1891; Der Liebestrank (The Elixir of Love), 1891; Erdgeist (The Spirit of the Earth), 1895; Die Fürstin Russalka (Princess Rusalka), poems, stories, pantomime, 1897; Der Kammersänger (The Tenor), 1897; Der Marquis von Keith (Marchizul von Keith), 1901; Der König Nicolo or So ist das Leben (King Nicolo or That’s Life), 1902; Die Büchse der Pandora (Pandora’s Box), 1904; Totentanz (The Dance of Death) 1905; Musik (Music), 1907; Die Zensur (Censorship), 1908; Der Stein der Weisen (The Philosophical Stone), 1909; Bismarck, 1914/15; Herakles, dramatic poem, 1916/17.

A neurotic symphony in poetic trance has never been written. However, this unconventional formula was appealed to in the attempt to record the poetic imagery, states and obsessions of a doomed society which determines someone to withdraw and live in a tower. Maybe it’s the first time one has got into the Marianne Pitts of poetry. Scardanelli is a book written in the manner of the great doomed writers, a group including Hölderlin, Kleist and Trakl.

George Morarel was born on October 22, 1948 in the city of Turnu-Severin. He graduated from primary school and high school in Turnu-Severin in 1966. Between 1992-1993 he was a German translator for the Betina construction company in Germany. Afterwards he was Head of Section and Director of the Multimedia Archive of the Romanian Television, wherefrom he resigned, leaving for Paris. Cătălin-Mihai Ștefan managed to write a disturbing book about the avatars of an identifiable identity. His poems, flashes of memory, are offered to a time already lived, small missing worlds which ask for their eucharistic mouthful of bread and teaspoon of wine. What would we have without memories, what would be those memories without us now? The puzzle of these personal “histories” takes shape only after the untold things begin to accumulate and feel as present as those passed. After an honorable debut, The Avatar’s Muse (2005), Cătălin-Mihai Ștefan returns to poetry with a convincing book, thus joining the best poets of the second wave who emerged after the turn of the 21st century. (Serban Axinte)

Apaosuri is the volume of poems who fills you with a sort of candor, in a language that forces you to grow up to the point that you realize that in fact each stage of life does not mean anything else but one more step in a hopscotch play. The poet reveals, in a novel way, the flavours and energies of post-socialist childhood. In other words, Apaosuri is the volume of lyrical holograms that the inspired poet brings to this natural-robotic postmodernism. I believe that through this volume the author wins, in his own right, a well-deserved conspicuous place in the landscape of 2000+ poetry. (Paul Gorban)

The chance of playing and communicating with the “speechless ones” – animals, birds, fish and other creatures – through sensibility, generosity, intuition, will offer children a lot of existential benefits recognized by psychologists, educationalists, parents, artists, scholars, who support the importance of man’s relationship with Nature in the process of acquiring formative and aesthetic qualities, vitality, balance, normality. The present book refers us, in the language of poetry and drawing – which are often more easily understood by little children than by grown ups –, to the richness of the natural visual and emotional subjects that are still there, lost in the artificial world we live in but capable to redeem it. Short poems and images virtually redefine a diminished wild universe to fit into the shelf of the library, under the severe look of the thoughtful parent, anxious of any dangers that might occur in the open horizon of legitimate infant investigation.
The stanzas written in Romanian, English, and French provide a universal appeal to the compelling advice: Admire and love the beasts!

A Dinner of Prawns, originally published in 1987 (Cartea Românească Publishing House), consists of a collection of sketches and stories, having as a common denominator the geographical area of the Iberian Peninsula. The narrative style is racy, with short notes, imposing a lively reading rhythm. It is a kind of fiction that subtly engages the interest of the reader, challenging him to reflect on and compare experiences. Iberian stories may also be the gate of entry to the sometimes fabulous world at the other end of Europe.

Mihai Giugariu (born 1929) is the author of literary text cast in various generic frames but mainly novels, short stories, essays and translations. Particularly successful were the novels Condottiere, Such a Long Holiday, Magdalena, Towards the Evening, and The Guide, as well as the volume of essays The Apple of Paris. The novel Destinies published in 1990 and in a new edition in 2003, was awarded (ex aequo) the 1992 Award for Fiction of the Romanian Academy.

Grace, the first romantic paranormal romance in Romanian literature, whose plot is changing Amy from a shy and marginalized teenager into a strong and daring young lady. This is the moment when her life takes an unexpected turn, and when the beliefs and fears of the past she thought she had forgotten are beginning to come true. Just on the moment her life seemed to have become normal, everything changes from a simple wish. Mysteries and secrets deepen and multiply every day. Grace, the first part of the trilogy of the same title, evokes the life of the teenager Amy before the dramatic change, and up to the fatal consequences of that permanent contact with the Otherworldly. It remains to be seen if Amy will make it at the thin dividing line of the two worlds...

For many years I’ve been a card reader, this is my impression of the seven years of weekly reviews in the România literară magazine. The authors I’m writing about in this volume are the ones I cherish most. Their books made me ask questions, set up a system of values, figure out the world I had come out of, and come to know what I wanted from the world of tomorrow. They are books that shape the spirit, from which you always have something to learn, they are direct or winding paths to great wisdom. (Tudorel Urian)

This charm of poetic vagueness provides the author with an undeniable originality and intuition of essentialist poetics.” (Radu Cârneci)

The tragic adventure of a large family of dwarfish Jews in the village of Rozavlea in Maramures, admitted to the Birkenau camp and used by Dr. Mengele in his experiments of eugenics, seemed to be no more than a picaro story. It was perhaps for this reason that reliable, official investigations are lacking, or maybe because it was considered that the way patients were treated in the camp would affect the image of the ferocious German doctor. By reconstructing in a fictional piece of writing this terrible saga of the Ovitz family, the author tries to get closer to that philosophy of history that is sometimes choked by partisan ideologies.

Sentenced as Killer is an attempt to recreate the realities of the “golden age”, but also those of the period when the Russians imposed communism in Romania. The central figure, architect Tudor Gurău, disappointed at the lack of perspective of his job as a designer of prefabricated fences, pig sties, and bedsitter blocks for single people finally realizes that his place was not in a boring design institute. He wonders if it is time to flee across the border, hoping he could reap the fruit of his skills in the West... He must disappear so as not to pay the price of his own life for a crime he did not commit. He steals the car of those who had come to his house to arrest him, drives in it across half of the country, takes a bycicle for the other half, and finally crosses the Danube over to Yugoslavia.

The first part of Song of the Fleeting Moment – “Dedications” – presents the author's wanderings across the wonderful Dobrogea space. The Chapters “Your Silence Tells Me”, “Psalms”, “Incantations”, “Hymns”, “Glosses”, “Philocalic Gifts” are those in which the poet confesses his constant concern for self-reconciliation, the service of his neighbor, and the desire to approach the divinity and praise the Creator.

Referring to The Seagull in a letter dated October 1895, Cehov noted, among other things: “I write a play that I probably will not have finished by the end of November. I write it with pleasure, although I fear the conventions of the stage. It’s a comedy, there are three roles for women, six for men, four acts, scenery (a lake view), a lot of conversations about literature, little action, much love.” The premiere turned out to be disastrous, and his publisher accused him, for example, of excessive cowardice, the effeminate character. Aware of his genius, Cehov replies: “Why this slander? After performance I took dinner at the Romanoffs’. On my word of honour. Then I went to bed, slept well, and the next day I went home without a sigh of some kind of dissatisfaction. If I were a coward, I would run from one publisher to another and from one actor to another, I would have begged them to be lenient and I would have spent two weeks in Petersburg, making fuss about my Seagull, emotionally unstable, sweating in lamentations. I acted so cool and responsible as a man who had made a bid, and, being met with refusal, had had nothing else to do but to go. Indeed, my vanity had been crushed, but you know, it was not a blow out of the blue. I had been expecting a failure being prepared for it, as I had also prevented you with absolute sincerity.”

you will get angry or laugh. The possibility that you will marry or maybe vice versa is not excluded, you will divorce simply by reading it. So before you turn the page, think well, maybe it is not worth knowing so many things about men. In this book, man appears exactly as he is in reality. And this view is not for simpletons. That is why I repeat: if you cherish your illusions, if you still want to think that men are big kids, give up on this book. Do the same thing if you’re sure you know everything about men.

As men were the better writers, women were blamed for all the disasters in the world. (Samuel Johnson)

Women are... different. They live among us, talk to us, wish for something, ask for something, reproach us with negligently casting about our socks, iron our shirts, chatter all the time and crowd our bathrooms with hundreds of coloured small bottles. They have got deep into our lives, and even if we think we have got accustomed to them, they manage to surprise every and every hour. Even the one whom you have known a lifetime and whose habits are familiar to you is capable of leaving you breathless. It is not her intention to do that, she only wants to arouse your interest, because that is in her character. Perhaps this ability to behave strangely in the simplest situations is encoded in her DNA.

“I found something more bitter than death – woman. The love she offers you will catch you like a trap or like a net; and her arms round you will hold you like a chain. A man who please God can get away but she will catch the sinner.” (Ecclesiastes 7:26)

A great novel, ignored by critics either out of cowardice (…) or out of indifference. Be it as it may, as literary criticism is not just a hermeneutical exercise but also an axiological one – otherwise interpretation is gloomy and amorphous, stinking of stale water – I decided to break into the fabric of the novel in order to decipher the hidden figure, to assess its depths, and why not, to see to what extent, deliberately or through fatality, is the unseen part of the author lying there in hiding. And I do not think that means courage but honesty. (Mircea A. Diaconu)

In D.R. Popescu’s novel, unlike John Barth’s The Floating Opera, the hermeneutical gesture sins on the side of excess rather than lack of interpretation, but the effect is the same: the frustration of the one who wishes to receive the recipe for use or preparation together with the purchased goods. The novelist’s erudition in point of contemporary critical and theoretical schools – in a parodic version! – is remarkable, capable of intimidating professional critics. The chameleonic style of metafictional passages is characteristic of current eclectic practices – otherwise stricter in terms of “canonized” theories that enter the mixing pot of postmodern literary theory – adopting, in turn, old or last-minute travesties. Why a book about the life and works of Vasile Voiculescu?
The answer can be complex and nuanced. On the one hand, the accumulation of a large amount of biographical and critical contributions demands for a reevaluation. On the other hand, even the variety and wealth of information cast doubt on previous statements. Beyond these reasons remains the fact that Vasile Voiculescu was an erudite with a profound thinking, one of the immortals. His complex personality has to be placed in the present context. Not for cheap rhetorical effects are we repeating the question, altering it a bit: why a Voiculescu monograph in the age of the breaking of idols? Before giving other answers, we confess that we are concerned about the way this book will be received. Perhaps the well-established critics of Voiculescu’s works will be curious to know how Gheorghe Postelniciu from Parscov Vasile Voiculescu’s birth place, sees his illustrious predecessor. We hope they will find that this is not a celebratory book, to tell the truth, our documentation was accompanied by an admiring sensibility.

In the nineteenth century man became a function of the various powers of politics, science, biology, technology, or, as in the case of Darwinism, of ontogeny and phylogeny, not always winning in such asymmetric competitions. The nineteenth century knew both victors, such as Napoleon, and losers, such as the petty, powerless man confronted with the perfect power of the car. Both paths are relevant, and both of them got into the socio-cultural, ideological and political syntax of the 20th century.

This is the fascinating story of a scribe, written by one of Gallimard’s favourites. A trap-headed title meant to inspire the minds attracted to the fabulous stories of mankind. “I tried secretly the position of the scribe, but the bending scribe is an athlete of writing, a well-trained champion, neither too weak nor too fat. First, he walked along the Nile’s shore, armed with a sharp tool to cut papiruses surrounded by foxes and hoopoes, but no one remembers that; and when he crossed his legs to sit down, he grew old without any wrinkles: his usual features are those of a mature man, but the proportions of his body are those of a child, as if he had passed from play to writing, from knucklebones to hieroglyphs, without being touched by the anxiety that makes us our hands shake. He draws effortlessly, with a firm hand, the light soul of things, because the writing he wished to be magic was primarily a profession: the most important one, which we learn with the children of princes, and which gives us an unforgettable name at the royal court; which leaves hands white and nourishes every man in all seasons so that the literati could be in Egypt “saturated with knowledge”. Scribes command all the others, the people with feeble minds, who bend their spine, the slaves who handle the pickaxe and the oars... "

Born in 1956, Lara Gal (literary pseudonym) studied philology at the University of Bucharest. She worked as a secretary, then as a translator, in one of the communist factories, and after 1989 she specialized in Human Resources in a renowned multinational company. She was in her teens when she started writing a personal diary, discovering its therapeutic qualities. Self-Portrait at the Age of 28 represents a 6-year chapter of this journal. Lara began to draw the first impressions of this emotional self-portrait at the age of 28, hence the title. It is a self-portrait of personal knowledge, a self-portrait sketched in real-time, under the eyes of the reader, as filters the emotional states through which she passes, analyzes her feelings, considers the outcome of possible actions, analyzes the decisions she takes, the possible consequences. Lara’s dilemma is the reconciliation of the heart’s need for novelty, for spontaneous experiences, and the monotony of marriage, even if she is happy? Her consciousness is caught between love for the husband she knows to be fit for her and whom she loves, and the exciting love affair with another man, who gives her the thrill of spontaneity she is craving for. The novel focuses deliberately on the lover. Lara is perfectly aware of the harm she is doing to the three characters involved: husband, lover, herself. The period in which this self-portrait is created and completed is the last of Communism, the years in which the deprivation imposed on the population resembled the deprivation of war. However, the heroine stubbornly focuses on her love, the movements of her soul, retreating into her own feelings, and thus managing to save herself from self-pity and survive in an apparent state of normality. Serialized, almost entirely, in the Contemporanul Journal more than 10 years ago, the author managed to overcome her hesitations and publish this book.
An entertaining novel which earned the author, Gallimard’s favourite, several awards.

„Inițial am avut impresia că cel ce m-a determinat să vă propun spre analiza procesul de stereotipizare pe care societatea îl aplică, în anumite circumstanțe, scriitorului a fost un bun prieten pe ale cărui cuvinte canalul generos al Messenger-ului mi le-a așezat de vreo două zile în față: nu-i așa că scriitori devin, pe măsură ce înaintează în vârstă, tot mai orgoioși? Apoi mi-am dat seama că ideea unei discuții pe această temă trebuie să-mi fi apărut, măcar așa, într-o sculpire, de fiecare dată când mi-a fost dat să aud că scriitori sunt dezorganizați, lipsiți de pragmatism, visători, sentimentali, lubrici, parazitari, slab la matematică, mai buni morți decât văi. Și, pe de altă parte, de fiecare dată când mi-a fost dat să văd scriitori purtându-și ocupația prin lume ca pe o haină, răsfoindu-și propriile...
cărți la cenaclu, creându-și nu doar opera, ci, cu stridență, imaginea, înfruntând, cu plete și carnet de notițe, ploaia, sau confratii.” (Adriana Teodorescu)

“Initially, I had the impression that the one who prompted me to analyze the stereotyping process that society applied in some circumstances to the writer was a good friend whose words the generous Messenger’s channel threw into my face the other day: is it not true that writers become more overbearing as they age? Then I realized that the idea of a discussion on this subject must have crossed my mind, at least in a flash, whenever I heard that writers were disorganized, devoid of pragmatism, dreamers, sentimental, parasitic, bad at mathematics, better dead than alive. I probably also thought of it every time I had the occasion to see writers carrying their profession about as if it was a coat, leafing through their own books at literary meetings, creating, not only literary works, but also their public image, confronting with their notebooks the rain, or... other fellow writers.” (Adriana Teodorescu)

A shocking book about the life of Jesus Christ and the wonders made by the Son of God. A book about the incompatibility of the world as it is with the teachings of the Son of God. “The world, as it is, and this Book cannot go together. Either the world, or the Book: otherwise the world should no longer be what it is, or this Book must disappear from the world. The world has swallowed it up as a healthy man swallows poison, or as the patient swallows the medicine; swallowed it to absorb it or to eliminate it forever. Twenty centuries of struggle, and in the last three centuries the struggle has been such that even a blind man could see that they cannot be together; either this book or this world will come to an end. “

“Did Jesus Exis?” This question will be answered not by the one for whom He only existed illo tempore, but by those for whom He existed, exists and will exist. That He existed, even children know, but the wise do not know. “Who are You?”; “How long will You take hold of our soul?” (John, 8.25, 10.24). What is He – myth or history, shadow or body? You must be blind to confuse the body with the shadow; but the blind one, as soon as he reaches out his hand and touches, he realizes what is body and what is shadow. No one would have bothered to wonder if there was Christ, if, before asking that question, his reason had not been darkened by the desire that Christ should have never existed. In 1932, He is just as Unknown, an enigma, the “sign that will stir up opposition” (Luke, 2.35), as in the year 32. The miracle of His appearance in world history is for men an eternal mote in the eye: ready to deny history rather than accept this miracle.

“Oh, miracle of miracles, endless astonishment! One cannot say, one cannot think of something that goes beyond the gospel; there is nothing in the world with which we can compare it.” These words were spoken by the great Gnostic of the second century,
Marcion; and this is what a simple Jesuit Catholic of the twentieth century says: “The gospel does not stand beside, not even above all human books, but outside them; it has a totally different nature.” Yes, another kind: this book differs from all other books more than the radiance of the other metals or the lightning of all the other fires; as if it were not a little “book,” but something we do not have a name for. (Dmitri Merejkovski)

The sign of the divinity of Jesus is already that in such a short time – a year and a few months – everyone filled with His teaching and faith in Him. (Origen)

“Did Christ Exist??” Napoleon asked Wieland at a party thrown at the court in Weimar during the congress in Erfurt in 1808. “It is as absurd as if you were asking whether Julius Caesar or Your Excellency” Wieland replied. “Well said,” Napoleon replied, and smiled. Twenty centuries of struggle, and in the last three centuries the struggle has been such that even a blind man will see: they cannot be together; either this book or this world is coming to an end. “

O istorie politico-sentimentală a capitalei noastre. De ce o istorie politico-sentimentală? Pentru că, în evoluția Bucureștiului, de-a lungul secolelor, afacerile politice s-au înpletat adesea, inevitabil, cu bătăile înimii. Chiar prima perioadă a cetății, ca și capitală domnească, tutelată de figura dominantă a doamnei Chiajna, poate fi bănuită de un senzualism crud care a deschis drum acelui fenomen pe care Ionescu-Gion îl numea atât de plastic „ginecolatrie”, adică ascultarea dovedită de domnitorii valahii față de soțile lor.

A political-sentimental history of our capital city. Why a political-sentimental history? Because, in the evolution of Bucharest over the centuries, political affairs have often been inevitably interwoven with heartbeats. The very first period of this fortified city, as a princely capital, guarded by Lady Chiajna’s dominant figure, may be suspected of a cruel sensuality that opened the path to what Ionescu-Gion so appropriately calls “gynecolatry”, that is, the obedience shown by the Wallachian princes to their wives.

Autumn of 1532. A dreadful rumour spreads like lightning from the royal seat of Bucharest to the remotest nooks of Wallachia: “Vlad Voda, son of Vladut Voda, is dead!” The speech is clear. But the circumstances of death are disturbing. The Voivode had gone away after a prolonged binge, heading for his residence but reaching no farther than the place called Popești. There Dambovita ran wide and deep, and it was there that it engulfed the Primce and would not let him go. Historical narratives and monographs, riddles and proverbs, the Bible rewritten for children are just a few of the author’s literary works serving as a school bibliography, recommended both to students and school teachers. Among the titles already in print there are memorable scenes from Romania’s history which include: The immortal Dacians, The Romans, Decebal and Trajan, The Founders, The Boyars and the Phanariotes, the volume of legends and stories Hearts of Brave, a collection of legends and stories, two books dedicated to the little ones and passionate about history, A Medieval History of the World for Children and A Modern History of the World for All Children.

I knew I was getting myself into a journey which might take too long for my physical resistance, and so it was. First, the Iasi-Bucharest train. Very hot in the afternoon... You can imagine that. But there were other problem too. In the first station, some excessively cheerful daily workers got on the train: they were very tanned, tattooed, and they were coming back from work, I assumed, but that did not temper their aggressive conduct. They felt at home themselves at ease as soon as they took their seats. They turned on a CD recorder plying some vulgar entertaining hits, and started to smoke and drink spicing their speech with unhedged swearing.

I am glad that this Romanian writer in Israel, although thousands of kilometers away from the country where he was born, does not stop feeling like a Romanian writer. With humor, intelligence, with that sharpness of spirit that always characterizes Romanian Jews, he has earned himself a position in contemporary Romanian literature. (Răzvan Voncu)

G. Mosari is the writer of his travels, who perceives the great world out there while writing about what he sees in a relaxed, pleasant, appealing tone. He expresses himself naturally, calmly, his language is well tempered, without flourishes of enthusiasm. He is skimming on superlatives, enjoying himself without exaltation. What he has to say is conveyed in an unaffected idiom, nuanced, here and there we come upon an intelligent, spiritual remark or a lyrical turn, all in an impeccable Romania language. (Zoltan Terner)

G. Mosari has written a considerable number of travelogues which record impressions from his various journeys. We had come to consider him a specialist in the field. In his latest book, “Great Actors Reminiscing,” he surprises us by addressing a new theme. Mosari’s book is not only a presentation of some great actors and their performative art. Indirectly, it is constituted as a memorial written with verve and humor. (Iosif Eugen Campus)
“The Almanac of My Travels” – a breathtaking book which you cannot leave aside before reading it through, takes the reader on various journeys, sometimes imaginary ones, through the wide world. (Iulia Deleanu)

“Combining on the spot observations with charming narrative digressions, the synthetic spirit with subtle ethical comments, G. Mosari remains a master of the travelogue, measuring up to his forerunners in Romanian literature.” (Ion Cristofor)

“To a greater extent than the splendid observations scattered throughout the analysis of N. Breban’s novels, the pertinent positioning, the confidence of the tone and the ingenuity of the approaches, it is the figure of the creative spirit that we mostly admire in this book, seen by MV Buciu in the attitude of the prosecutor towards the double oppression, ideological code and writing, both in their alienating effects. The author shows a special interest in a certain species of creative lucidity that recognizes or knows the limits of writing and consciously chooses the form of alienation. It betrays the admiration for an exemplary destiny and perhaps a dream of transmutation, which explains the participative tension of the sentences.” (Eugen Negrici)

“It is a spectacular result of the application of a unitary system of interpretation, combining theory and analysis in adequate proportions. (...) The key concepts fit in lock of the text, thus opening it to interpretation in an expert way, without using the toolkit of impressionism.” (Ion Simut)

“By refusing to conform to the native traditions of” impresionist” comments on the margins of the text and of quoting the text word for word in front of the audience, the author acted in the manner of an American academic: the expectation of maximum yield, minimal redundancy, up-dated “delivery” to the user, critical approach to the user, the air of an internet-search with computer-assisted processing. The approach is completely thematized, and the book is built in a honeycomb system: the cells, once established by identifying and delimiting the relevant problems, are filled in with the paste of information and analysis.” (Nicolae Barna)
“I am persuaded that in the next ten years Marian Victor Buciu will have completed a significant body of criticism” (Mircea Ciobanu, 1993)

Citing him, reciting Nietzsche, reading and reciting the Nietzscheans, the Dostoievskians, I was remodelling myself, shaping myself, and at the same time I was reapplying myself to the Nietzsche “continent”, and in time, perhaps again and again, at a quicker pace, volens nolens, under the Dionysic auspices of this writer, I was becoming what I am: poet. A poet disseminates a sort of strange religion of the living, essentially unprescribed, a Nietzschean mythical religion, built on an excess of personality.

(...) With a bit of luck, illness can be the kick of an infamous, evil god into the bright bolges of destiny. My experience of this spectacle of sparkling drama – which is Nietzsche – is by chance to be transformed into destiny. Yes. And at the will of Destiny. (Aura Christi)

I have finished reading Nietzsche and the Great Noon in a breath (however, the verb “to read” only imperfectly conveys the synaesthetic effort required by such a complex and rich book of ideas. At a first level, the volume can be read as an impressive catalogue of the “great themes” in the European literature (German, French, English, Russian, Romanian), that directly or indirectly relate to the Zarathustrian pull of the former Professor at the University of Basel. But at a second level, much deeper and more significant, it is an exceptional eulogy to the vitality injected by the divine nous into the texts of Berdiaev, Shestov, Kierkegaard and, especially, Nietzsche. The strongest and most transparent filiation that comes to mind after leafing through your book is Rudolf Otto: although it does not need to explicitly quote him, the book is infused with the concept of the “numinos”, that ineffable sacrament perceived by the German theologian in his capital work, Das Heilige. I congratulate you on this volume, exemplary in all respects, and I am convinced that the people to whom it is addressed will not be the same after reading it.” (Catalin Ghita)

“Here it is, in the words of Aura Christi, flowing abundantly, from hidden sources, the vivid stream of poetry, and let us not fear the rhetoric of capital letters – of great Poetry.” (Nicolae Balota)

“A woman-warrior in spite of her fragility, disseminating courageous texts to which the poet’s close friends do not hesitate to attach a “pure dynamite” tag, angry with many, writing feverishly, assuming the risks of the Balkans (restrained, punished, isolated, etc.), Aura Christi, quoting the “atrocious” words of her beloved Nietzsche, wants to become what she is: a poet. (...) Her metamorphosis is striking; the speech became a syncopated, austere chant, celebrating “dream life”, plumbing – through “love poems” – the serious themes (relationship with master, divinity, death, poetry), and concluding that life, only if narrated, is worth living. Many of Aurea Christi’s exegetes have highlighted the poet’s “spectacular ascension”. Aura Christi had the chance to move to Bucharest. But the poet’s merits, beyond her inborn talent, lie in the steadiness of her self-construction, promoting – programmatically – “rupture.” (Adrian Dinu Rachieru)

“A great surprise was Aura Christi’s collection of psalms, written by an unknown sister of the Karamazov Brothers. The prolificity of the author, which might make some automatically think of improvisation and superficiality, is, on the contrary, paradoxically the expression of an abyssal, pathetic, a trance fall. Each verse has resonance in the reader’s soul, like a sentence pronounced under the vaults of a cathedral.” (Alex Ștefănescu)

This book is an “escape” from Cioran, a “breakup” with him. Nevertheless, it is not a “controversy,” but a careful and amiable separation, and, I think, provisional, because one cannot get rid of the cultural contagions of adolescence and of early youth, it would not be wise to do so, but you can tame them. And, I think, this is the effect the author will trigger on herself by writing this book, an excellent one, because it is a very well-thought-out and written book. The Cioran she will deal with from now on will not be a devastating, imperialist author who’s mapping out his own personality while diminishing her own, trying to “parasite”, “vampireze” hers. His influence will no longer be a modelling one, in philosopher Lucian Blaga’s sense of the word, but a catalytic one, allowing his partner in the encounter to move on along his own path, while also benefiting from the knowledge acquired as a consequence of having read has his works and having dismantled his oxymoronic and paradoxical thinking. Constantina Buleu’s interpretative approach seems to be stimulated by (not to say, “in love with”...) the indefinable, mysterious, irreducible limit of “power” and its nineteenth-century representations. Whether she presents us orthodox structuralist, neo-aristocratic, Jungian, Lacanian, functionalist-symbolic or phenomenological methodologies, the author is constantly fascinated by a phenomenon which, at one end, presupposes order, rationality choice, instrumental logic and, at the other, intensity, magnetism, charisma, in a word, magic. The book manages to present less a “paradigm,” than a panorama of the spirit in the nineteenth century in relation to the theme of power. The courageous opening of a phenomenon of this magnitude reminds one of the heroic aura of famous intellectual enterprises, often invoked with admiration and skill in Constantina Buleu’s book. The constantly vivid intellectual curiosity, the clarity of thought, the broad bibliographic opening, and, last but not least, the very personal turns of her style places this approach in the category of reference works. “A Jew, Russian poet and American citizen” – this is how ironically characterized himself Joseph Aleksandrovich Brodsky (1940-1996), a writer who, after 1972, signed Joseph Brodsky in one of the many interviews he had been asked for in the course of life. By solving the difficulty initially encountered in English, the language spoken in the country of his exile from the US, the poet found a formula under which he could both hide and reveal himself. For those who know the “formulaic” nature of Brodsky poetry (poetry, unfortunately, “hidden” in Romanian as only a booklet has been translated by Emil Iordache), the ultimate explanation might be the one that comes first. It is quite difficult to tell who this author is, although labels and exegeses are not missing. How does he want to be recited by the person who has repeatedly spoken about himself, including from the height of the Nobel Prize or Librarian of the Library of Congress, giving the world an “official” biography, its heroes and myths, and doing “homage” to “several Virgilian shadows? “Less”, or “More” than one?
The volume published by the author, one year before Brodski received the Nobel Award (1987), Less Than One (translated into Russian under the title Menšie ediniț / Less than one) goes in part under these questions. The title of the book collapses three hypostases of Brodsky’s personality: autobiographical, critical, as poet-reader-interpreter, and translator. Finally, comes the diarist-touristic self and the citizen of the world. All of them as “annexes” of the poet. Experiences chosen by the author of this volume are carefully sized through the lens of the camera.

Subject: Literature
Ideea Europeana Library Series
Published in 2011, format 11x18 cm, 232 pages
Editura Ideea Europeană

The Feline Myth in world literature is an attempt to synthesize in an accessible but non-superficial form an impressive amount of material found in both Romanian and foreign publications.
The subject of the work was a subjective choice, being close to the author’s soul.
Each chapter handles one aspect of the theme revealed in the title, while respecting a chronological line, which significantly facilitates comprehension and assimilation of information. But the whole work has as a common point the oscillation between the real and the fantastic, fabulous plan, between official documents (such as chronicles) and the testimonies offered by popular superstitions. In the first chapter we observe the country of origin of the cat, Egypt, and how it was treated as a deity with contradictory attributions (sometimes beneficial, sometimes sinister). Although their export was forbidden by Egyptians for religious reasons, this did not prevent their spread in all cultures of the world. Various legends about the birth of the cat to different peoples are also analyzed. The second chapter deals in detail with a main feature of feline myth, namely its appearance, implicitly, female. Femininity, tenderness, maternal instincts, whims, cunning, elegance, independence are just some of the common qualities of women and cats, qualities depicted by countless writers and artists of all times and cultures.
The third chapter depicts the eternal conflicts between cats and dogs (fighting for human trust and affection), cats and mice (a millenary “fight” between Good and Evil, where the good represented by the cat cannot always keep its purity. These “battles” have resulted in many people obsessing with cats. However, cats have always been independent creatures, never accepting a “master”. There are a few writers who in their works have portrayed cats as people capable of absolutely anything: write, read, sing, play theater, and even speak. They also have some human qualities (compassion, the ability to love), but also some human defects (selfishness, violence, indifference). They are also given supernatural powers, such as clairvoyance.

She wanted to sign a covenant with literature, and has succeeded in that, above all, by casting elements of life into a more enduring form, by creating an incremental set of characters and of themes threading the stories in a narrative continuum with autobiographical touches. Through these life stories, the author wants to reconcile with his past, one she did not accept, nor quite understand back then.

Existence as Diaphaneity, which is a sequel to The Circle of Grace (2003) and One Book per Week (2007), represents a well-balanced and pertinent radiography of the Romanian publishing symptomatology of 2000-2010. Stefan Borbély has included in this book both reviews of books by personalities of Romanian literature (Marin Sorescu, Mircea Zaciu, Nicolae Breban, Marin Mincu, Livius Ciocârlie, Adrian Marino, Horia Roman Patapievici, Mircea Cărtărescu, Paul Cornea, Dan C. Mihăiescu), and of books by young authors (Adrian Dohotaru, Cătălin and Roxana Ghiță, Adriana Teodorescu, Florina Codreanu, Ioana Macrea-Toma, Constantina Raveca Buleu), along with essays on history and grammar of mentalities and in the field of cultural studies. The analytical thread, with a good theoretical opening and impeccable precision of concepts, Ștefan Borbély is especially interested in cultural ideas and symptoms, the texts dedicated to Adrian Marino’s diary (Life of a Single Man), Marin Mincu’s experimentalism, or to Paul Cornea’s readings in modernity being among the best written in the field. Starting from particular cases and volumes that have, without exception, a vast, exciting, open-minded opening, Professor Borbély’s book represents a very comprehensive, critical and synthetic work, written out with grace, competence and professionalism.

As a general framework for our discussion, I propose a translation poetics. In my opinion, this discipline – whose territory violates (even “crosses”) the lines dividing the fields of applied and theoretical linguistics, the theory of literature and literary creation – focusing on acts of communication. The site on which a communication act takes place includes the source of a message, the message itself and the receiver of the message (which is rarely a passive one, most often acting as an interpreter of the message or of the text).

We go on to remark that the translation process is composed of two linked communication acts, the first of which takes place in the language and culture of origin, that is, the source language, and the other in the sphere of the target language and culture. The translator is the link between the two segments, as in him meet the reader and interpreter of the source text and the producer of the target text.

“The problem of Romanian being has not been solved. Although it represented a mystery to the whole last generation, the main reasons for its existence, due to the conflict between the West and the East, between the two fundamental social doctrines, because of the Iron Curtain that fell at the end of the Second World War, which separated the world into two political blocks, the problem has remained unresolved. What actually is meant by the inquiry into the Romanian being? Shaping a national identity, that was an obsession of Romanian interwar nationalism and of the “young generation” that identified more or less with that epoch. The utopia of that generation was to get Romania out of anonymity. Everything remained at the level of illusion and skepticism. Out of the whole generation that survived internal displacement or exile, two faithful representatives thereof dedicated themselves to defining Romanian being or, rather, its way of manifestation in the world. These are Cioran and Noica. This book – truthful, radical, precise, dark – treats their mistakes and their fulfilment in the context in which the whole continent, in the interwar period, seemed to have gone mad.” (Mara Magda Maftei)

The Sublimity of Treason is plumbing into the “multidimensional” world of theatrical creation. Convinced of the existence of thinned layers of the spirit in which the representation is meant to exist, the author departs from any “trivial”, first-hand interpretation of the scenic art. By appealing to theories of theatrical aesthetics, as well as philosophy, psychoanalysis, exegesis, and literary criticism, a complicated, complex artistic universe emerges which is prone to profound analysis. The spectator is no longer positioned as a passive viewer, but as a partner of the actors.

Both in his hypostases as writer of fiction and of drama, Emil Mladin is a creator of “strong” plots, with well-drawn characters and conflicts that engage them in the fullness of their personality. At the same time, the courage to penetrate into marginal social areas and the territory of solitary psychologists is doubled by a careful eye to detail and a “penel” capable of depicting the infinitesimal nuances of an atmosphere of authentic tonicity.

The Jerk is the first novel in which the writer’s gift to imagine memorable characters is manifested in its fullness. It opened the way to all subsequent novels, from Father Mavrodin to Champs-Elysées, consecrating Emil Mladin as one of the canonical writers. who emerged after 1990. At the same time, the novel falls in with other books written by members of the same generation, a poetics coming thus into view with preference for short stories and postmodernist experimentation of the Eighties generation and “significant realism” (defining Cătălin Țărlea) in the Nineties. The return to narrative processes, such as conflict or the character’s inner unity, is being preferred over the dominant meta-novel in the 1980s.

Emil Mladin’s narrative invention does not exclude in The Jerk, as it does not in the plays, some moral accents, which show that attending to marginal social areas and groups is not free. Possessed of a sense of measure, the writer is satisfied to bring moral problems to the reader’s attention without moralizing. His novels therefore hinge on weighty matters.

The book is written within a period of several years, along with fictional texts, and contains cultural and artistic studies and articles, literary and dramatic chronicles, interviews with personalities in Turda and other Transylvanian cities. The monographic study of the “Pagini Literare” Magazine (1934-1943) is the first major work on the “good magazine in Turda”, as literary historian D. Murarașu assessed it. Poet Teodor Murișanu (1891-1966) was its patron and publisher. “Pagini Literare” worked mainly with Transylvanian writers, but also from other parts of the country, young and old: Pavel Dan, Grigore Popa, Mihai Beniuc, V. Benes, Romulus Demetrescu, Stefan Augustin Doinaș, Victor Felea, Teohar Mihădaș, I. Cărja-Făgădaru, Petru Bucșa, Gherghinescu Vania, Ion Agârbiceanu, Emil Isac and many others.

Here are some of the personalities whose books are reviewed by the author: Pavel Dan, Ion Agârbiceanu, Mihai Beniuc, Valeriu Anania, Aurel Dragoș Munteanu, Adrian Țion, Ion Buzași, Ovidiu Iuliu Moldovan. Some essays are dedicated to the Ratiu “Dynasty”: Ratiu, the member of the Memorandum Movement, Dr. Ion Ratiu, the politician, Augustin Ratiu, Indrei Ratiu. Dramatic reviews and chronicles map out the diversity of cultural presence in the Transylvanian area between Turda, Cluj-Napoca and Alba Iulia.

In a city where the brilliant generation of novelists launched by the Tribuna Journal edited by DR Popescu have almost disappeared, most of them defecting to journalism, editorial work, and so on, when the Steaua Journal, in its turn, no longer boasts any prominent novelist, the space of Cluj fiction is being gradually taken by newcomers. Among them, Mircea Ioan Casimcea is a fiction writer who “is here to stay,” as I would say with a less elegant formula, but fully covering the moment that his fiction represents. The most successful samples seem to me to be the stories written lately, in which the absurd, the odd and fantastic, or the strange type dominate the entire epic construction.
The one placed in the opening of the book provides the title of the whole collection: It Happened in Calostra It exposes our imagination to a shower of uncommon techniques and props, reminiscent, in my opinion, of the atmosphere created in his fiction by Grigore Cugler (1903-1972), an absurdist writer resurrected not long ago. But the author does more: she extends her area of observation, including also writers of fiction and essays. She reads not only sympathetically but also critically, but – as she confesses from the title – she is a “gentle scorpion”, interested above all in the access to spirituality of the writers she is glossing on. They are search for a path, an initiation route. The spirit is mirrored in the spirit, in other words”. (Livius Ciocârlie)

Angels and the Laughing-Weeping is a kaleidoscope of short stories, various in point of narrative structure and typology, realistically or mysteriously positioned in the exploration of unpredictable affective worlds and in the development of the idea. At large, here is what they call “Active Fictions Show”. The narratives are of a Gao-Latin parcimony, but here and there the author makes room for a more flourishing language, verbocratic, or for a quasi-bourgeois fantasy in the description of a slightly derelict, interiorized, over-reality, appealing to our ability to imagine with our eyes closed, or even widely open. The variety of texts resembles a multiple opening of doors, while placing antennas to capture signals from the psychosocialism of existence, doors opening to fantastic, fairytale (intellectual, modern), dream. There is a consilience (and interaction) of research through art and intuition, truthfulness and ineffability.
Leo Butnaru is a bearded devil screaming and kicking in the middle ground between good and evil, that is to say, in a world of apple bark, floating on the crest of the waves in the Prut river. He wants to be a gladiator of destiny, but he cannot control his own, which means he is a real poet.

Leo, pick up the oars and let the wind drive you to the Romanian Nistru, to the delta of amazement that Europe gathers near the Ismail Ceatal, to the mysteries of the Carpathians. (Fanus Neagu)

Although living in the world of the Prut beyond, Leo belongs organically to Romanian literature. You would say he lives in Bucharest, Rădăuți or Ramnicu Sarat... (Mihail Gălățanu)

Trying to penetrate the magic of artistic ebullition has been an old temptation of mine. The depths have a mermaid in them. It was surely my attempt and perhaps uninspired. The germination of this book now seems to me an experiment of joy. Two priests and two literati, as well as confessors, each with his disciple, wanted to travel for a moment into the ineffable kenose, or self-destruction. The novel Angelus novus is about “a strange, unmistakable, or very rare fate with unusual twists, that of talented Albanian writer Bashkim Shehu. A pampered son of the most powerful and long-lived Prime Minister in Albania’s modern history, who explored the civilized world when others dared not think of it, later experienced for about ten years life in the country’s ill-famed prison in Burrel. After the physical and political removal of Mehmet Shehu, a hero of the anti-fascist struggle in Spain, a legendary commander during the Second World War, and later the second most powerful Communist dignitary after Enver Hodja, Bashkim and his family suffered the torment of persecution.

Other writers wrote about the subject of persecution under communist dictatorship, but most of them were simple citizens, expressing their accumulated sorrow, revealing scary aspects of life in prisons, accusing persecutors, claiming their rights. Unlike all of them, the author of the novel “Angelus Novus” does not directly blame anyone, they do not take responsibility for lamenting, taking revenge, or claiming the recovery of their lost rights alongside ten years of political conviction. From the crowd of co-sufferers, he chose Mark Shpendi, a resident of the faraway region of Nikaj-Mërturi, northern Albania, a bold, inspirational mind, though with minimal instruction, interrupted in Tirana for political reasons.” (Kopi Kyçyku)
“Here it is, in the words of Aura Christi, flowing abundantly, from hidden sources, the vivid stream of poetry, and let us not fear the rhetoric of capital letters – of great Poetry.” (Nicolae Balotă)

“Aura Christi possesses the deepest meaning of the tragic. Her lyrical discourse, of exceptional verbal and imaginative force, does not avoid pathos either.” (Sorin Alexandrescu)

“It’s all serious here. Neither the playful, nor the parodic, nor the fatigue of the post-industrial context, nor the destructive tendencies of the postmoderns can go through. The modernity of Aura Christi is an essentially organic, resilient mode, striving for the reinterpretation of signs and universals. The questions she is asking were also those of her forefathers, while the answers transcend the acquisitions, revealing the evolution of consciousness on the move, the evolution of a first-hand, totally personal, creator. Her late works, The Labyrinth of Exile (2000), Northern Elegies (2002) and others confirm the consistency of an exemplary conscience.” (Constantin Ciopraga)

Can you hear me, stranger? I’m reading your poems in the evening, keeping watch on a terrace, facing the hills of Jerusalem. I am not a good poetry commentator, those who wrote about your poetry “read” you very well, they have a force, a rare touch of the tragic, and a flair for transcendence, without falling (fortunately) into what goes by the name of “Religious poetry”. It is a heathen instinct that prevents you from the excessive “Christianization” of poetry, even in the Psalms. “

(Fragment from a letter) Leon Volovici

“It’s simple: I see God as an interlocutor, with whom I rarely argue. I often read the New Testament in the evening. And then I feel the stir... I do not go to church unless I feel the urgency to do so – a fact which makes my mother reprimand me sometimes. I take my church with me, so I can pray anywhere, any time. Unlike our philosopher Cioran, I believe that it was not the Devil who made the world, but God; it is only that towards the end of His Creation He tired a little; The same happens in a piece of prose by Rilke, where the two hands of the Lord compete with each other, and the left seems to take advantage of the fatigue of the right one... I sometimes wonder, walking in the footsteps of Unamuno: who am I to blame God for the world we live in? (Does this small creature have the right to quarrel with Him, of all the world?!) And like Unamuno, reminiscing Oberman, I answer: yes, for the world, for the universe I am nothing, I mean nothing, but to me, I am everything.”

“Austere Gardens lay – yes, incredibly – in the drawers of some publishers for about seven years; Years of atrocious isolation, of desired loneliness, loved, bloody, and again, loved... It’s a volume published after a drought when it seemed to me – in my dark mood! – I would never write poetry... Even my debut book had not been waited for so feverishly and for... centuries.” (Aura Christi)
“The fact that Austere Gardens has gone through my PC has given me a joy, a restlessness of the auroral days. I could not help but read a few poems. Then I could not leave it from my hand. I was overwhelmed by the vital spirituality that imbues her verse. That does not happen to me so often when reading contemporary poetry.” (Zoltan Terner)

“From what they supposed to be an outsider of the ‘90s generation, Aura Christi evolved to a prominent figure among her congeners, recapturing the field (literally) through a totally spectacular evolution.” (Mihail Gălățanu)

Fragile, yet a woman-warrior, consuming a lot of passion, disseminating around courageous texts which the insider friends do not hesitate to call “pure dynamite”, upsetting many persons, writing feverishly, assuming the risks of the Balkan world (‘lynched”, punished, isolated, etc., Aura Christi desires, in the words of Nietzsche whom she greatly admires, to become what she is: a poet. [...] This is a striking metamorphosis: her discourse has become a syncopated, austere one, an incantation celebrating “dream life”, testing – in her love poems – profound themes (the relationship to a master, divinity, death, poetry), concluding in the end that only by being told is life lived. A good many of Aura Christi’s reviewers have underlined the poetess’s impressive ascent.” Her merits, however, lie in the tenacity of her self-construction which programmatically enforces the “split”. The Access 2007 – Proposed and Resolved Economic Applications is a guide for business professionals to learn how to operate in MS Access 2007 and to use the database management system functions to quickly solve current problems.

This practical guide is a useful tool in informational management and skills training for specialists evolving on an open labor market but under increased competitive conditions. In addition to the practical operating framework in this program, proposing and solving some economic applications offers the possibility to apply acquired knowledge, but also the possibility to think about how to achieve an economic application, starting from the current requirements. The gradual increase in the degree of difficulty of the applications presented presents challenges but also the satisfaction of those who are trying to develop the proposed applications. This resulted in a coherent work that consistently pursues its goal of providing an MS Access 2007 approach and an applied perspective of knowledge in the field of articulated databases on an economic one.

The main merits of this work consist in the skillful construction of a double dimension, namely computer and economic, underlining that the tools provided by the information and communication technologies must be effectively used in the implementation of applications conforming to the requirements of the users.

Although it has a predominantly pedagogical character, this practical guide is addressed not only to students who wish to develop practical working skills in MS Access but also to practitioners who want to use this database management system to solve their current problems. By the mode of treatment, the work can also be used by those who train themselves as self-taught. (Mihaela Muresan, Elena Ilie)

“After the publication of the monumental (in the literal sense of the word) History of Contemporary Romanian Literature, 1941-2000, Alex Ștefănescu has become a notability among our literati. Admired or envied by his fellow critics, invited and celebrated in the provinces, interviewed by reputed journalists, Alex Ștefănescu is always in the spotlight, his presence in one place being impossible to go unnoticed. Even those who want to ignore him eventually lose their nerve, and start hunting him, blacking him but indirectly enhancing his visibility, notoriety and popularity. Alex Ștefănescu is, in the world of literature, the kind of character that leaves no one indifferent. Some are friends, others are dead (those not included in hisn history, and those mentioned in his TV show for bad books, “The Cap of Pearls”). Finally, there is a category of those who court him with the secret hope that they could ingratiate themselves with him so as to secure a bright future for themselves in Romanian literature.” (Tudorel Urian)

“Alex. Ștefănescu is the only contemporary Romanian critic who methodically imparts on criticism the characteristics of an “act of persuasion”. His strategy consists in the seduction of the reader: language is free of abstractions, without losing its conceptual precision; the critical expression, always unobtrusive and often memorable, has a certain tangible materiality, which renders it accessible; the pleasure of reading and writing, almost palpable, becomes contagious, inviting to hedonistic reveries; Finally, the language is interspersed with suggestive comparisons, all the more impressive as they are not born of bookish endeavour but harvested from common experience, being also infused with graceful humor that ensures the emotional communion with the reader.

“Recipe for Concocting an Emotion” is written in the form of a dialogue between a naive reader and an experimented one whose scholarly exposition touches upon the nature of art, the relationship between the writer and his readership, the talent, the relevance, the psychological mechanism of creation, success, etc. It is, in fact, a small “treaty” of aesthetic, alert, efficient education targeting a real audience.” (Petru Poanta)

“This novel is a wonderful work of art. The least interesting thing is what is said about the relations between Nehliudov and Katiusha, and the most interesting thing is represented by parents, generals, aunts, peasants, detainees, prisoners. The scene of the general commander at the St. Peter and St. Paul’s fortress involved in a seance of spiritualist communication gripped my imagination while reading it, so vivid and persuasive it is! To say nothing about Madame Korchagina, immobilized in her armchair, or that uncouth peasant, Feodosia’s husband! This peasant loves his wife and says she is “as fierce as a Harpy”. So is Tolsto’s pen. However, the novel has no ending, for its conclusion cannot be taken for one. Writing, writing, and then putting everything to the door of a gospel – it is exceedingly theological”. (Anton P. Cehov)

“I began to think about how good I could be at writing a novel of longue haleine, in light of my present conceptions. I thought I could cast into it all my plans, all the failures which I regret.”

“I am totally absorbed in The Resurrection. I think it will not come out badly. “Under my feet, there is the hard, frozen ground, I can see the giant trees, reaching above my head into the gloomy sky, I can feel my own body, my headache, my concern about The Resurrection, and at the same time I know, with my whole being, that the hard and frozen earth and the trees, and the sky, and my body, and my thoughts are all just the products of my five senses, of my imagination – a world of my creation, because my part of the world is as it is.”

“This book does not represent the stakes of great authorial ambition, it does not seek to revolutionize the” philosophy of love “, nor to open any new way. This is no manual, or “guide” to the relationship of the couple, of the kind spawning bookshops nowadays – as if one could give advice on love!...! Its purpose is infinitely more modest – namely, to press home some ideas bout an essential phenomenon, such as love, according to my own experience, the readings that are also part of this experience and the what a miracle is happening to them, if a single solitary suffering from love were to overcome the crisis, if a great disappointment left behind the power and the courage to try again, I would think I had not exerted myself in vain, confronting the temperatures of an incendiary summer. Besides, I thought, I think, and I will think, until extinction, that love is still a subject to write about, and not just in the pink novels, in the X series movies or in the famous soap operas. Love is too important to be completely and definitively abandoned to melodrama, vulgarity, bad taste. An old subject, since the world, covered in illustrious feathers, compromised by mediocre scribes, may demand that you should try your powers of comprehension as well as expressive powers. I wonder how sincerely I’ve been able to be. But it is no longer my problem, but that of my potential readers. As never before, not with such intensity, anyway, am I overwhelmed by emotion. After all, one cannot face love in any condition.”

Editura Ideea Europeană

Evolving through bifurcations and ruptures, Foucault’s thinking continuously reviews its methods (archeology, genealogy) and concepts (epistemes, devices, problem-solving). Under this interrupted line, one can read the unity, not of a system, but of a concern: the articulation between the “positive” analysis of the historical norms and the assessment of their crises; the separation of the constitutive subject from any referent, but also the emergence of an interstitial “self” capable of thinking in some other way.

This book undertakes the study of two landmarks of the philosopher’s work: the description, in the History of Madness, of the birth of the clinic, and the study in “subjectivization” with the ancient Greeks, in The Use of Pleasure. A new figure of criticism is visible: a non-ostentatious critique which, instead of appealing to reason and principles, allows of the existence of fault lines in the game of knowledge and power. Through this exposed and precarious position, from which each book extracts its own power of impact, the “morality of discomfort,” Foucault’s thinking is also a politics of uncertainty.

Doctor of Philosophy, Mathieu Potte-Bonneville is a professor at Jean Jaurès High School (Montreuil-sous-Bois) and a member of the editorial staff of the Vacarme magazine.

This edition in two volumes brings forth, for the first time in the history of Romanian culture, the whole of Traian Chelariu’s disputed journal. The Journal of the 1930s, largely unpublished before (fragmentarily, it was published by the Junimea Press in 1977), is interesting from several points of view. On the one hand, it records the atmosphere in the Chernivtsi intellectual environment of the interwar period. The academic life, the disputes among the young writers, the attempt to impose Romanian coordinates on the cultural world, are all glossed in the ten manuscripts. In the journal are reproduced letters sent to or received from Ion Nistor, minister in several cabinets, from Mircea Streinul, his energetic congener, and others. On the other hand, we find here traces of the shaping of a personality whose values are focused on the necessity for cultural growth. The stoic vision that Traian Chelariu embodied in the 1950s is based on the experience of a young man committed to the order of culture. In addition, the diary includes the experience of his studies at the Romanian School in Paris and Rome, being a relevant document from this point of view. (Mircea A. Diaconu)

Pata Tata. Chess is not a book of literary criticism, it is not a hybrid critical experiment, it is not pure fiction either, it is, in the most authentic sense that literature allows today the confession of a “haunted” sensibility. On the pages that project long shadows onto her own life and absences that imperceptibly steal from her autobiography into the books she is reading, Diana Adamek writes on a low, hypnotic tone, with the talent of a novelist. Avoiding the embedding conventions of textualism, or the concepts of literary theory, Pata-Tata. Chess is the novel of a poetic belief that shapes both the space of the living moment and the memory of readings along lines of great intensity. Considered in the context of the books of the first decade, this confessional essay by Diana Adamek comes to the fore as the most passionate and challenging testimony of a well-informed reader, and, as it would be revealed a few years later, as a remarkable writer of fiction. The title, The Temptation of the Limit and the Limit of Temptation, refers to what the author of the book regards as the essence of the Faustian myth: the overcoming of the limits of knowledge and the temptation towards what is beyond, the unknown or the impossible in the normal order of the world. The temptation of the limit and the limit of temptation is a critical investigation of ideas and motives from the perspective of a comparison oriented towards philosophy and aesthetics, which Professor Vasile Voia from Cluj University has consistently practiced in his career.

A component of Christianity and European culture, the cult of the saints owes its extent and endurance to the oral or written stories about their lives, which began to be disseminated in the Mediterranean basin in the second century. Aviad Kleinberg’s work aims to present a history of these histories and, at the same time, an analysis of their development and role in Christian society during the late Antiquity and the end of the Middle Ages. These stories are the product of diverse and often conflicting forces: the conceptions of the ecclesiastical authorities, which seek to impose a canon of faith and discipline valid for all, the popular belief, the imagination and the aesthetic vision of the authors. The emergence and integration into culture of these stories are inseparable from a complex social process. In them we find the creative religious force of the communities, expressing themselves by establishing a different vision of the world, which is often in contradiction with that of the Church.

Aviad Kleinberg, an Israeli historian of religions, a lay Jewish, was born in 1958. His parents experienced the persecutions of anti-Semitism in Poland and survived the Holocaust. He spent his childhood at Beer-Sheva, where “there is no sign of the Christian presence.” The studies of medieval history, which he followed in Tel-Aviv, made him pay special attention to Christianity, without whose knowledge “it was impossible to understand Western culture.” At the time, in the 1980s, “Christianity was still a taboo field in Israel.” Avid of knowledge, went to the Pontifical Bible Institute of Turin, where he studied Latin, theology and canon law. Currently, Aviad Kleinberg is Professor of Religion History at Tel Aviv University, and his courses attract hundreds of students.

Planet Rilke. Planet of Giant Rilke. Everything pours inward with unpredictable forces, fulfilling the sign of the “new being,” of a formidable, powerful, suggestive, inspired start, anticipating “a new great glow that gives strength and abundance of images to my tongue”, so that “sometimes I am surprised at how receptive to myself I am and how much I learn, in amazing awe, in my own dialogues. Something sounds in my depth, which wants to get out to people, going over these pages, over my dragon songs and all the plans for future deeds.”

The jubilee notes turn our eyes to the expanse of glittering self-reading, in excess of force, with such full and powerful love that it frees itself from the heavy chains of fear, becoming a praise of being, a praise of fulfillment and of being contained in excess: “I feel as if I should speak now, in moments of force and clarity, when I speak more than myself: my soul. I feel as if I could convert all those who hesitate and doubt; For I have more power in me than I can hold in words, and I want to use it to free the people from fear, from which I myself have come.

Starting from Ioana Em. Petrescu, the proposed study aims to prove with the arsenal of the phenomenological critique of critique, always updated, a theory regarding the assumption of Eminescuism by the most important poets of the last century. Eminescu’s news is also proven by the eternal re-reading and assumption of his poetry by poets such as Bacovia, Blaga, Barbu, Arghezi, Labis, Nichita Stanescu. This Eminescian presence, assumed theoretically (see Blaga) or melted in the depths of poetic texts (see Labis or Nichita Stanescu), supports the validity of the Eminescian canon. Eminescu is inert only if we look at a significant part of the current poetry, too anchored in a reality emptied of meaning, a poetry bereft of the transfigured depth of the Creator. Eminescu’s (un)timeliness proves only our tragic inadequacy. (Florin Oprescu)

I turn critically towards an insufficiently known literature that has come to light in the last decades, afflicted with the Nobel Award complex. Our common attitude fits in excessively relativistic or absolutist, trying to become a shareholder and provoke reactions in an artistic field with multilingual support. I test, as I have already said, the native fund and the universal form in the Romanian fiction of the 20th century, highlighting the substantial experiment, insofar as it fits or attempts to differ from western fiction. Leaving aside the intrinsic value, a meritorious and deserving translation will be shown to prove that Romanian literature can successfully march towards the desired and bloody Nobel Award... “This young writer is animated by a rare form of passion. Forming oneself means also shaping others. We are not amazed at the frequent appeal of the essayist to the modeling patterns, even though it is not a question of repeating epigonic experiences. The model can (and must be) somewhat playful. Ion Barbu is, in this perspective, a ludi magister. With spontaneous generosity, Aura Christi shares her experiences, she is ready to give advice to young poets, following Rilke’s well-known ones in the Letters to a young poet
Here is the book of an author with a fully achieved literary career. A destiny that Aura Christi assumes. Moreover, she builds it irrespective of sacrifices.” (Nicolae Balotă)

“There was once again a mature mastery of means, a special, original stamp in the chorus of young poetry, and especially a beautiful ambition to mold, to wear out a whole range of poetic technique in brave contrast, I would say, with some poets or representatives of the youngest generation of lyrical artists who sometimes water down their inspiration and personal themes to a manner that looks like fashion or literal terrorism. The two themes of the volume – “Royality and Deification” – touched by a repressed pathos, and aspiring to an almost classical cult of form, betray the horizon, the ideological scale of the author who successfully attempts in this volume to propose not only original themes but to embed her poetic art within the classical modes of good and great Romanian and universal poetry.” (Nicolae Breban)

Its action is taking place against the backdrop of the Balkan conflict between Serbs and Albanians in the last decade of the last millennium. I read it in the manuscript and I am able to say that it is an excellent study in a collective psychosis, which casts light on the workings of the unconscious.

Florin Logreșteanu, a member of the Romanian Writers’ Union since 1999, made his debut in the Luceafărul magazine in 1974, on the recommendation of two reputed writers, S. Damian and Nicolae Velea. Until now he has published a volume of short stories (The Birds’ Crossing) and three novels (Steps, The Inseparables, Labyrinths), favourably reviewed by important critics, such as L. For the terms of conflict, a decisive factor has been, under the circumstances, the age in its forms of coercion and emulation. I am convinced that under other circumstances the equation would have different components. I do not suggest that the restriction in the illustration I am proposing would be mandatory, I could add with the same justification, I admit, other applications. The analyses are not exhaustive, they insist on a characteristic phenomenon. The confusion experienced by some notabilities of literature on the route was partial or total, determining a civic engagement or aesthetic bonding. Some of the ones selected for examination (G. Călinescu, M. Preda) are no longer alive, so they are excluded from the possibility of a change of destiny. Everybody feels the need of connecting to the horizon of the modern age, of responding to the pressure of the power relations, of dogmatism, to the chances of a synchronization with Europe. There is a compelling necessity to deny nationalistic and provincial prejudices, to escape from the nightmare of ideology and harsh oppression.

Gabriela Crețan writes poetry with gnosis enfolded in it. The fact has been noted since her first book, and this type of construction has remained constant, even if there have been some shifts in emphasis. Gnosis, that is, apocryphal, is the scaffolding of a vision of paroxystic intensity. What really matters is the imaginative breath, the spasmodic unleashing of the imagination and the frenzied rhythm in which the sublime melts away into the grotesque, or the hymnic heights collapse into vivid apostrophizing. Gabriela Crețan imagines an oxymoronic world of unseemly coincidences, in which the grammar of sacraments can no longer be distinguished from the infernal. Her way of translating visionary juicing into sarcasm and celestial fever into violent repulsion would fit into Giorgio Agamben’s “profanation” concept. Her poetry is not however limited to philosophy; Gabriela Cretan writes with a sort of exasperation and in a frenzy about the most uncomfortable way of being in the world: as if mastered by an atrocious imperative. In this atmosphere, reality overlaps with the worlds of Yvonne’s mind. The fact that Yvonne Growing up in hospitals, Yvonne comes to see physicians as parents, developing psychoses and fantasies that will follow her during her academic studies as well. The psychological trajectory is deftly thought out and analyzed by the author who takes his heroine through real-life situations which she has to face up to. Her reactions are always disturbing, unpredictable. The script is anchored in different environments, such as hospitals, universities, conferences, literary societies, as Yvonne becomes a writer. The real and the imaginary are subtly interwoven, the greatest writers of the world joining in an imaginary conversation in which Yvonne takes part. The fragility of human existence drives Yvonne into an attempted suicide but she survives. Finally, the one who will make her understand that nothing matters in the world more than friendship, the real friendship between people, is Hermann, who, in Yvonne’s mind, is Father Hermann.

Ex, a love and conspiracy novel, is the astonishing story of a Balkan digger, an individual who is blessed with a miracle rarely encountered in literature or journals. His life changes after an ordinary dream, a skull and a friendship being offered to him by two young men who fight, each in its own way, the unpredictability of existence. Uncommon, not only in point of language and humor, but also through a gentle vision of everyday discontents and of that ancient “war” – visible, tough or underground – between generations and not only. This romance of love & conspiracy reveals some hidden realities of the strange exchanges convened between generations of people who, from the point of view of sense and mentality, are mutually exclusive. Such exchanges essentially conceal a game, or rather, the game which Man has neglected until he can only play it having his own fate as stake, but which also is the only chance of the species to survive.

The authors, a literary critic and a physicist, survey the main directions of the critical theory of the last two decades, the empirical source of which is the literature published at the turn of the new century. From the parallel study of theoretical and fictional languages, one can observe the epistemic and rhetorical homogeneity of literary works belonging to a phase in the history of literature, the modelling force of a spirit of the time that manifests itself beyond geo-political boundaries. At the same time, through a comparative reading, one can demonstrate the impressive capacity of a national literature to re-establish, in a very short time, the links with the major cultural centers and successfully “negotiate” literary forms and literary ideas of a comparable age, through encyclopedic and synthesis ambitions, with the Renaissance. The approach has an interdisciplinary character, at the boundary between philological study and the epistemological models provided in the “age of complexity” dominated by quantum physics.

Structured in three cycles, Iulian Boldea’s book stands out by the precision of critical assessment, its objectivity, and the appropriate critical methods. At the same time, critical points of view, perspectives and hypotheses are worked out so as to point out subtle details about the object-text down to its subliminal level. The critical approach of the author is, above all, characterized by rigorous assertions and the relevance of the demonstration. Issues such as responsibility and indifference, memory and confession, human death and God’s death, banality of evil and radical evil, free violence and the uniqueness of the Holocaust, extermination of innocents, and survival in the death camps are being addressed. All this is settled in an ethic of responsibility that puts us in the face of genocide as an ideological and existential paradigm of the twentieth century.

Although it deals with a particular theme, this book is of general interest. It addresses researchers from several fields: philosophers, theologians, literati, those interested in the study of responsibility, ethics, ideologies, history of ideas, and debates around totalitarianism. The book’s publication in the year of the 65th anniversary of the death camps being abolished will enhance its good reception.

At the same time, it must be emphasized that it is the first book of its kind in the Romanian culture. By discussing issues that concern the human condition, the meaning of life, the meaning of death, the problem of evil, we can imagine that it will awaken the interest of a broad audience with a diverse cultural formation, in addition to the audience of readers that the author has already formed through his works earlier.

Emphasizing the way of building a ethics of responsibility, the present book brings up a new perspective in Romanian culture and in the Holocaust analysis in general by resorting to the textual and sub-textual meanings, as well as the exegetical literature related to the work of one of the most representative personalities of the Romanian diaspora.

“Everyday life is absorbed within, while the suspense creating tensions are redirected towards the same need of becoming. Aura Christi’s cast of characters are from some other world, inbetween worlds, inbetween ages, inbetween banks... (Irina Ciobotaru)

The author’s express intention is that of plumbing characters’ depths so that it is characters instead of action that come to the fore.” (Bogdan Mihai Dascălu)

The fictional body is strikingly original and – that is the biggest achievement – has a sound of its own. It cannot be classified according to Nicolae Manolescu’s triad: Doric-Ionic-and Corinthin. But, unlike the author’s previous books, this one emerges from a triangulation of the three. (Nicoleta Sălcudeanu)

Here is the book of an author with a fully achieved literary career. A destiny that Aura Christi assumes. Moreover, she builds it irrespective of sacrifices.” (Nicolae Balotă)

“It’s all serious here. Neither the playful, nor the parodic, nor the fatigue of the post-industrial context, nor the destructive tendencies of the postmoderns can go through. The modernity of Aura Christi is an essentially organic, resilient mode, striving for the reinterpretation of signs and universals. The questions she is asking were also those of her forefathers, while the answers transcend the acquisitions, revealing the evolution of consciousness on the move, the evolution of a first-hand, totally personal, creator. Her late works, The Labyrinth of Exile (2000), Northern Elegies (2002) and others confirm the consistency of an exemplary conscience.” (Constantin Ciopraga)
“Perhaps here is the enormous merit of the Circle... It submitted me to a pretty hard exercise, that is, to formulate reasons why it is worth living. And not in front of a man who hates his life, or is disgusted with what life seems like to him. But in front of this female girl, Diana, who is deeply searching for meaning, who loves flowers, water, art. So lively is your creature, that its charm spills over and throws her into death. Diana shows that it’s not easy to live out that huge hunger for life at a big height, the huge power to live. Her thirst for life and beauty and tranquility expose her, make her fragile... Her nausea is caused by the harsh and ugly waters of a world unfamiliar, careless to physical aggression... A world of beasts in which no one offers protection to the offspring. A humorous world where butterflies and deer are snatched, swallowed, as if... Maybe that’s why they were born... Maybe God calls them to him... Or maybe not! Perhaps a huge responsibility should be taken on my shoulders and not just mine! Perhaps beautiful people, like Diana, have an unpredictable force in their fragility. Perhaps nothing can be done for teenagers for preventing them from choosing death... Perhaps nothing can be done against death...” (Irina Ciobotaru)

When the lens closes up, although still barely perceptible, the subject receives a new enhancement from the imagination, not in a spatial, but an intellectual sense. The manner seems to me to have been borrowed from Hogas, a writer present not only here in travel notes, but also in Grigore Ilisei’s fiction.” (Val Condurache)

“In his descriptions, deploying a metaphorical painting in fresh colours, Grigore Ilisei is also a narrator, appealing to stories as a “disturbing lesson” (history is also interesting, because, of course, “history is a treasure”). This interest in history can only deepen the reflexivity of the notes. “

Xerxes appears now at Hellespont after the Xerxes play. The possibilities of interpreting the message are virtually endless, as by transmuting lyrics or words, we can easily “descend” into the immediate reality. Therefore, we are justified to ask: has not the poet, by some subtle stylistic twist, opened a “forgotten” loophole to the problems of his biography? (Dumitru Hurubă)

Lidia Lazu signs a delicate-confessive poetry, divided into distinct moments, structured like a diary. Although the term structure is somewhat inappropriate for this theme of evanescent feelings that are transcribed as such, without attention being paid to their articulation into a whole or pattern that would impair upon their fluidity and diaphaneity. The breath of being is unencumbered, subjected only to the moment, the transient incantation. His expectations are naive-fabulous, in the continuity of a childhood that has not been exhausted, which is intensely relived in amazement, and imaginatively enriched... Such fantasizing autoscopy is the fruit of virtuosity in simplicity. The coherence of the text emerges out of this inability to accept a pragmatic order in the name of an uncompromising candour. In contrast to Luciferic criticism, the poet gives herself to the world not only through contemplation, but also through a sort of existential automatism, abandoning herself to being as if bereft of a personal will.

And that is the morality of ecstasy.

It’s a symbolic bow. Fictive, or is it really our world condemned to drift on an ocean under which an apocalyptic tsunami lurks? Yes, indeed, Breban does not neglect any species, they are all preserved here, it is enough to remove the difficult, fragile and yet the woven curtain resistance of thousands of pages of book, to discover a cruel humanity that many of us, of readers or authors, we tend to avoid it, the tendency to make it, to do aesthetic operations... The ark has the ability to revive the ashes and to propose an imaginary journey to another dimension, trying to save them alike believers and atheists, strong and weak, victims and executioners, masters and disciples, servants and masters. You choose which side you want to be outside the arc, the ark, or its fragile and yet tough, intimate structure, capable of leading you to the most insidious territories that have not yet been invented and which only Breban’s compass will indicate and place on an otherwise inaccessible map.”

Clepsidra is a paradoxical novel, written with humor and gravity, about identity, love, guilt and death. Dozens of scenic characters cross the life of the protagonists Paul Iulian and Maria, each with his personal character and history, his dramas, illusions and strangeness. Couple Paul and Mary are like a couple of wandering pilgrims looking for the Grail of our time—a better world than home—but discovering something more than what they wanted to discover at the end. This is another identity, hidden in them, which determines their destiny and, to get to it, they had to leave Romania in Canada. They are emigrants, but the novel is not really a novel about emigration. Emigration is but an accelerator of their existence. And, in addition, how does a Roman character, who is not an emigrant, think? Who is not in possession of an identity different from the original one and has been assumed and developed by ancestors closer or more distant? Individual search corresponds globally to the great history, driven by great evolutionary identities. In the novel, it is about the dialogue between Canada and Quebec amid tragedies from other parts of the country, from the former Yugoslavia of Milosevic or from Africa to the Rwandan massacres.

“The most disturbing book published in 2009.” (Ștefan Borbély)

The Critics’ Treason is an excellent imaginary essay, a subjective narrative, inevitably irritating (it is the literary life and the radical views of a novelist who does not hesitate to write what he thinks about his colleagues), with memorable portraits, sometimes cruel ones, sometimes bright, abounding in superlatives... Its merit, beyond literary qualities, is to open up a real debate about our literary life in which groups confront one another and build their own history and mythology. Nicholas Breban comes in and disturbs the water, probably annoying many, if not all.” (Eugen Simion) “Breban’s book is a strong, non-concussive, sulphurous, emotional one through its optimistic stake, passionate advocacy, and the author’s desire to stand up against prejudices and ridicule defending the ideal of his youth, which was the ideal of aesthetic autonomy in the name of the high art to which he has permanently aspired, and on behalf of the Romanian nation which he is not ashamed to confess. This book is not easy to classify according to current typologies. Surprising in its overwhelming oratory, its unleashed colloquialism. (…) It resembles an areopagus of lived destinies, verbalized through persuasive and courageous speech. Something in this condotiere figure makes me associate this book with the speech of a Roman general after a lost or undecided battle, somewhere in the Germanic North, or before another battle that should be won at any cost. (…) The whole discourse is based on the idea of the decay in the offensive spirit, on the idea of the loss of the old virtues; and the allegations seem to come from someone who knew in his youth a glory and a show of grandeur. (...) The pathetic, impassioned twists of Breban’s discourse – marked by anger, candour, distress or hope – are drawing absorbing portraits, his wonderful portraits, coloured by his characteristic epithets. The context is usually unambiguous (for example, the role of Free Europe and of the Social Dialogue Group is very carefully and unsparingly analyzed); we are offered invaluable memories of literary history germinating fruitful ideas. Some of them have already been adopted, because they have convinced me.” (Eugen Negrici)

“Literary creation, the critical spirit were profoundly affected by the ethical and political polarization at the end of Romanian communism. Ethics and politics have exceeded their limits, even without them reaching real power and autonomy. The literary audience, thinned by the new interests of an open world, scattered and witnessed the fraternal struggles of the writers and critics who, under the tyranny, had fraternized in the name of imposing or at least maintaining the criteria of art and value. An internal war, especially paralytic, followed, or a literary pretext followed, continued. The few necessary corrections, called revisions, have been replaced by excommunicating attacks. False communication, (self) triumphal, produced a seemingly good and an essential evil. Evil comes from “house”. Breban finds it, and he assumes, “Guilt, blindness, was and is ours, in a way we deserve subclass.” The writer writes a book for connoisseurs, conceived with lively insight, a book that is necessary for our literary, cutting-edge reality, but also for a very long time, about literature and criticism “betrayed” and less translated. Because “betrayal” was, we know it well, there is no irony.” (Marian Victor Buciu)

“Leaving aside its provocative title, The Critics’ Treason is an apology of living literature and a plea for everybody’s return – critics, poets and prose writers alike – to their tools. The abandonment of political fantasies and star games wars over literary power and the return to major creation can be, according to Nicolae Breban, the premises of a new cultural era in the history of Romanians. The author does not regard the role of literature from the narrow perspective of the writer, but from that of the whole nation, whose construction as a modern nation began and relied on its literature. The present, unfortunately, is ghostly, has no consistency or direction. Neither national nor European. In this axiological chaos, Breban proposes as the dominant reference point, even the tyranny of the good old aesthetic value. It is a bet convincingly supported by Nicolae Breban’s post-communist works which are at least as great as the ones written before 1989.” (Răzvan Voncu)

“Extremely important, this book reveals a living Nicolae Breban, of amazing argumentative force, re-thinking the self and the world. Basically, one of the book’s potential readings is this self-rethinking and re-election, or re-assuming – the essay is a sequence of proofs in this argument — of his personal literary destiny. An assumption involving the transcendence of the local, national condition (in the sense of limiting literature to a kind of cultural provincialism) towards a superior status. However, if the The Critics’ Treason does not show a good digestion of the current culture and literature through its highly strung problematization and complex discourse about the world, only a prejudice would lead us to opt for contemporary habits to the detriment of the former. After all, our getting over Dostoevsky is just an illusory effect of perspective. A matter of representation. We’ve seen how many traps it hides. We believe, however, that The Critics’ Treason will effect beneficial turns and revaluations.” (Adriana Teodorescu)

Land of Ashes and Diamonds is the story of unnamed young men who have made their own way, revolutionized the theater and became famous. A story of love between the Master and His Disciple. Protagonists: Jerzy Grotowski and Eugenio Barba, two great masters of the 20th century theatre. The action takes place in the Ubu kingdom, in a bleak Poland, stirring with secret police officers, informants, a country governed by cultural policy. Time: 1961-1964, remembered with charm and humor by Eugenio Barba, as the years of his apprenticeship spent together with Jerzy Grotowski at Teatr-Laboratorium in Opole. Rhythm: Dynamic, entrancing, threading the holes of memory, the life span. Drama: For the first time, 26 letters of Jerzy Grotowski to Eugenio Barba are published that reveal their relationship of friendship and lifetime collaboration.

At the same time, it is the story of those who do not give up their dreams. They depart from the road to discover their own way. They recognize their masters to become masters one day. I say to myself: Ashes I know I am. But diamonds? Here, subtly, a warning to diamond sanders can be found: be careful what you polish, you might be sanding a handful of ash. An exemplary autobiography, almost unusual, made up of things that seem small, not subject to narrative norms, screaming at the reader, astonishing him. A story that reveals everything and nothing at all, telling us for the first time that even in the theatre the mask has no other utility than to be snatched away from the face. It’s all about what one faces when the mask is down.

A love story against an African background. Lovers will always prefer some particular place for their encounters. No matter whether this is Eminescu’s lime tree, the Cishmigi gardens, or – why not? – an ancient, almost forgotten epic, that place enlivens and colours the aura of love. Apud the Aeneid is a beautiful story of gods and shadows, a love story unfolding in the Sahara. The two lovers, a young man and a rich woman... in memories, rewriting pages of Vergil’s Aeneid, reliving the love between Aenea, the Trojan hero, and Dido, the queen of Carthage, with the added dimension of recent events, both being marked, obsessed, haunted by the shadows and experiences of the last days of “Golania” (a political protest) in June 1990.

A dangerous book! The book you hold in your hand is dangerous. Inconvenient, spirited, incendiary, it will surely disturb some important notabilities in the Romanian political arena, who often confuse politics with dilettantism, betraying the interests they had heartily sustained in electoral campaigns. Surely, Do not Be Traitors, Please! will alert the capital city’s mayors who are taking efforts to destroy the “little Paris” of the old days. This book, therefore, will disturb quite a few people through the scenes of post-December social-political life, all the more so as the cracking down humour is not alien to the author. Neither objective detachment...

“An eloquent illustration of the position that poet Vasko Popa currently occupies around the world is that Barack Obama, in his US presidential election campaign (which he won), confessed on 27 October 2008, on the blog of the International Harriet Foundation, that his favorite poet is Vasko Popa, the author of Little Box, because Vasko Popa “is aware of and responsible for the world in which he lives as well as for himself.” Neither did John McCain go too far from Obama on opting for Vasko’s fellow writer, and, to a certain point, his model – Henri Michaux. This is the good and beautiful side of things, which is due to Vasko Popa’s two international supporters who permanently integrate Popa’s poetry into the vast anglophone space: Anne Pennington, the translator and friend of Popa’s family, whose translation, also after her death, are still being published), and especially Charles Simic, one of the leading American poets of Serbian origin (he emigrated to the United States at the age of sixteen), the Pulitzer Prizewinner in 1991, who has never ceased to support Vasko Popa’s world poet status. On the other hand, politics also played in Popa’s case, as in the case of other leaders, public discourse makers, an unfortunate role... “ (Liubita Raichi)

“The publication of the first journal of the Romanian diaspora in Paris in 1948, entitled “Luceafărul” by its founders, Virgil Ierunca and Mircea Eliade, succeeded the Soviet annihilation of political Romania and partly of spiritual Romania, preparing the ground for what Julien Benda called the “treason of the intelligentsia” or of scholars. The reaction to this state of facts came, as it was natural, from among the exiled intellectuals, and above all, from what would be known as the “Lovinescu-Ierunca Institution.” This couple knew how to preserve the Romanian values, and not only the spiritual ones, to spur to action, to persuade, to incite those exiled Romanian intellectuals who were trying to make their way into that world which at the time did not offer, as it would later on, the inner peace that is so necessary for creation. Ierunca was often the one who dissuaded Mircea Eliade from limiting himself to confessional writings, encouraging him to seek an active life of creation and search. This volume, which “retrieves” “Luceafărul”, is the joint contribution of Mihaela Albu and Dan Angelescu. Their study, written with admiration and insight, shows in-depth knowledge of the feelings of those who, 60 years ago, did not abdicate from their duty. It impresses not only through empirical coverage but also through the scholarly background of the two authors which they use in the assessment of what the contributors to “Luceafărul” produced half a century ago.” (Dinu Zamfirescu)

“Simona Dragan has the capacity to undertake a personal approach to the canonical texts to which she dedicates her critical powers. She “sees” ideas in their original intricacy, restructures them according to her own script. I would like to appreciate that, despite its theme, the present work is not arid, it suffers (only in acceptable proportions) of that stylistic dryness, inevitable to any theoretical approach. The ability to synthesize, the critical spirit, the terminological precision, the lucidity and the suppleness, the operator’s objectivity, all attest to a fair amount of theoretical vocation.” (Mircea Martin)
“Similarly to the revelation we experience when an equation that had humiliated dozens of mathematicians finally finds its solution in a brilliant mind capable to work it out is do we respond to Simona Dragan’s critical readings. It is as if Foucault and his company, who instead of writings and texts chose to elaborate on the sophisticated use of writing and discourse, had met a worthy conversation partner. Dragan is not patching up a new text out of pre-existing sources showing a personal touch, a certain freshness of direct observation, a kind of enthusiasm over the debate of ideas, which is transmitted to the reader, pulling him away from his skeptical or worn out reflexes.” (Paul Cornea)

“In my opinion, a major merit of Simona Dragan’s book is that of having, in an unambiguously personal manner, expressed, with elegance and straightforwardness, some of the most complicated, not to say “bushy,” ideas ever formulated in the philological sciences.” (Caius Dobrescu)

Several pages of the Karamazov Brothers are constantly in my memory. Here I found the confirmation that beyond the absurd sinuosities of the individual life, the lonely ship carried by the capricious winds of the event, there is in man a secret spark, not necessarily of logic, which gives him the power and the ever-renewed desire to live, experimenting, even on a grotesque background, through individual experiences and knowledge, trying to reach a essence, it seems, chimeric. Man sees the lie of the chimer, but a diabolical desire keeps it further, until full burning. Are ashes any good? And even if they are no good, there is an inherent pleasure in burning. And in this uniquely irreversible experience, the rational optimal way of action seems to be universal, humanistic. There is an approximation of the essence of some seemingly very distinct human activity fields. It is as if there is a common point of origin and a unique end point, and on these two points the humble, but elevating lines of force of man’s thoughts and feelings are supported. Diversity of force lines is infinite, but there is a rigorous convergence of their initial and final points. On this belief I base my determination to experience, at the modest level that my ship will allow, the multiplicity of action. There are many thoughts that embarrass me, and maybe once, when they get a more precise form, I will try to materialize them.” (Basarab Nicolescu)

Fiction in Rural Setting had come to mean, according to common perception, a conservative, insignificant, supposedly simplistic, schematic prose, employing mean rhetorical devices to construct a rather rudimentary human reality, lacking refinement, subtlety or depth of soul. By contrast, fiction in rural setting was pitted against the former, in a quasi-Manicheist manner, bering invested with the prestige of a carrier of complexity, renewal and refinement, in a word, of added-value. In reality, however, this bias was in fact more and more vigorously invalidated by the emergence of works of “in rural setting” endowed with the characteristics of modern literature. This study seeks to trace, elucidate and summarize briefly three of the significant stages of assessing a truly modern, “rural-themed” fiction that emerged in the last two thirds of the last century, focusing on three representative writers: Pavel Dan, Marin Preda and Sorin Titel.

“Taking into account the many references to history and the importance and relevance of the temporal-historical perspective for any other subject, we naturally come to the heart of history in Emil Cioran’s speech. In the notion of all his obsessive themes, history is a mega-theme, in strong relationship with the others. The adherence and the enthusiasm for studying the problems of the philosophy of history have been witnessed since the beginning of the route, in several letters to Bucur Tincu from the 1930s. In those letters he speaks of “passion”, of spontaneous and personal thinking, of natural adaptation to the field, and shows confidently that, along with the problems of the philosophy of philosophy and culture, the problems of the philosophy of history “can not conceive that I would forsake them ever”. Among the many subsequent justifications – opposed as an attitude to those in the initial period, but which bear the same adherence –, let’s put two in correlation, written in the near years, where the preoccupation for history is described as addictive states: “weakness”, “thirst”, “passion”.” (Ioan Costea)

The book’s summary is composed of several texts signed by Nicolae Balotă, relevant to his critical and aesthetic conception, from a sketchy portrait by Matei Boila, two dialogues in which confessional accents and theoretical projections and two exegetical sections are intertwined. The first, “Interpretations”, contains approaches to the critical or memorial work of Nicolae Balota as a whole, while the second, “Readings”, includes close readings. The necessary bio-bibliographic references have also been added. A splendid novel of African adventures. Suspense. Intrigue erotic. High-class specialists engaging in an epic texture of surprising density. “Jérôme was the driver of our UN agency in Abidjan, Cote d’Ivoire. Driver, did I say? I think we exaggerated. He did not know how to drive. The steering wheel, the clutch, the brakes, the accelerator, and especially the gear shifter were tools that horrified him. I do not know how he got his driving license. I do not know how he got on the list of United Nations Development Program staff – UNDP, local. Normally, after a few days, I would have to change it with a real driver. But it was too late. I was attached to him, to his naked laughter, to his absurd optimism, to his typically African stories, in which reality mixes up with imagination, and in which he played the role of several heroes, the greatest being himself, of course. He helped us, at the risk of freedom and sometimes even of his life, to find out who and for whom the experts of the United Nations of Cote d’Ivoire were taken as hostages, if not simply murdered. For all this and for others, I considered that Jérôme deserves to be known by... a wider circle than ours, the experts, and I who wrote this novel, as he taught me, with a reality that often gets mixed up with the imagination.” (Alcaz)

For 100 years, the number of Nobel Prize-winners has exceeded 600 people in 41 countries. 60% of the prizes went to US, UK and German representatives. Unfortunately, since the start of the Nobel Award award ceremonies, a biased tendency has been noticed which often made Nobel committee members nominate the future laureates under the influence of a certain political context or depending on personal feelings, and not at all in the spirit of the will left by founder of the institution. However, the Nobel Prize remains one of the most prestigious awards in the world.

The media abound in information about individuals and networks of prostitution and pornography that sexually assault children. Systematically, newspaper readers learn that children have been assaulted, inter alia, to commercially exploit these abuses, to make sexual constraint more profitable. However, here this is only the of the iceberg. According to data released by the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF), in 2001 ten million children disappeared, were abused, prostituted, tortured or murdered in the world. One child is raped every thirty seconds. Several hundred million children are abandoned in the street and have to learn how to survive. Between one and two million children are recruited each year by the sex industries. In 2004, UNICEF estimated at about one million the number of children who were victims of traffickers each year. Sex tourism is flourishing: prostitution destinations are well known and well-supplied.

Trafficking in children is a trade that thrives in many areas. During civil wars, whole villages are being destroyed, women, raped, adults, massacred adults, children, kidnapped and sent to death in child soldier units. Children are kidnapped or bought from parents with false promises, sold to brothels, to foreign adoptive parents, or rented to landlords for domestic slavery.

Where to find words to glorify the beauty of the canals of Venice, the markets of Pisa and Siena, the center of Florence and Bologna or Fontana di Trevi, celebrated all over the world?! By publishing this book, I wanted to tell the story of the past and fate of the ancient cities that have disappeared, and equally of those which are carrying through ages their immortal look. Not all the cities have been included in the series of “100 Great…” and unforgettable, cities, for example, Troy and Micene, as well as many others... but we hope that the curious reader will continue this exciting research on his own.

“The novel is captivating, well written, despite some rhetorical effusions. On the other hand, it is a text written by a scholar, with readings from Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, Jung, or Dostoevsky undertaken in depth, thoroughly. Consequently, it is a novel in which the symbols appear all the way, embedded in the text, in the technique of a hermeneutical modernism that cannot be removed from the equation; of course, this manner of work may seem to be “dated” by deconstructionists, as playful, postmodernist nuances appear here more rarely, but the duty of the chronicler is primarily to mold the constructive intent of the text, appropriately interpreting it, without stretching it in a direction strange to its explicit syntax, which the text did not want, nor did it transpose it into its imaginary matter.

Strictly technically speaking, we find ourselves in front of a Bildungsroman built on a classic initiation scenario: the young Matthew (all names are taken from the Bible...) enlivens the tearful, dramatic death of his father, David, lost in a car accident on the Olt Valley, is in open conflict with his mother, Riri, a pragmatic woman, whose lack in human warmth is nervously masked, and fixes his entire affection on his grandfather Grig, who dies towards the end of the novel, and that of Professor Semion Ruda, a stylish, elevated, aristocratic city inmate and a “surrogate father”, to whom the novel’s protagonist ultimately owes his intellectual revival – the future student in philosophy – and literary training as a novelist, the compensatory talent of writing revealing him somehow without premeditation or exhortation from the outside but in accordance within his tumultous inside.” (Ştefan Borbély, Contemporanul, nr. 7, 2009)

“Andrew Fischof’s dense, hearty poems flow after one another without ostentatiation. Naturally, as the rain pours down from the orbits of the unnamed gods, as grass can be called grass only if it is the pasture of young Pegasuses. Wrapped in the cloak of the fierce cold, the poet refuses noise, grief, the storms of vain agitations, always opting to be the silent witness, of keen sensitivity, his eye, yes, the triangular one in the forehead, recording everything, almost everything. Landscape poems outline a world of the dark end, degeneration, decadence, and loss of landmarks. It is a nightmarish world, screwed into the bed of the apocalypse that is being invented, gradually, causing the witness – withdrawal, clinging to himself, attentive to the inner forces and to the voice to which he submits unconditionally – to imagine discreet, elusive, a rescue chance. And the witness responds to the challenge, just as a child, on the seashore, clinging to the miraculous horizons of his desire to be, keeps drawing a huge fantastic ship on the sand...” (Aura Christi)

Angels in Winter is an elegy in which nature is deeply involved: the old lady does not stop shaking off her cloak of stars with which she tribes an entire city, hiding away its “wounds”, dirt and defects, a city that seems to be getting ready for a funeral ceremony. For Barbu, virginal white has nothing idyllic about it, in the likeness of fairytales, being instead suggestive of the shroud that is slowly but unfailingly going to fall over the city. Along with the autobiographical, winter is also “writing”, with big and fluffy flakes, its “autobiography”, its volumes of silence. It is winter outside, as it is winter in the hero’s soul.

This short essay addresses less psychoanalysts or their patients than a slightly special audience, but increasingly numerous, of those who ask how to manage a therapy and even become a psychoanalyst. After all, how trustworthy is psychoanalysis, as long as people who are not ignorant or naïve, whom we do not a priori suspect of greed or even deviousness, continue with modesty to devote themselves to the field in question? Because such questions, unless we turn them a blind eye, are straightforwardly asked in the contemporary context, not only in some semi-public writings offered to the public through aggressive advertising, but also in the more sophisticated medical or critical research field.

As my field of research is not only psychoanalysis, but also the history and philosophy of this science, I hope I will be excused for having introduced my subject in this away. For some reason related to this skeptical questioning, even virulent and denigrating, taking the risk of a direct confrontmation with the present state of affairs in psychoanalysis, I have drawn from this field an overall painting in rather crude colours. It has been, however, only my starting point.

“This is the first imprint in the Romanian literary space of a novel by a young Italian prose writer, degreed in journalism and political sciences, who writes a dense, laborious type of fiction, closer to the French and German rather than the Italian novelists. A strange psychology, sometimes at the limit of the rational, but also of fantastic fiction, which rarely leads to formidable revelations of consciousness, makes us bet on this new name – Philippe Palini – and on his creative favor, of an unmistakeable and elegant originality.”
(Nicholas Breban)

Philippe Palini was born in Paris on April 23, 1971. At age four, he returned with his Italian parents to Italy, where he lived up to the age of 27, and graduated from two faculties: Political Sciences (University of Perugia) and Journalism (University of Urbino). Since 1999 he has lived in Paris. European Diploma in History of Political Ideas and Ideas, University d’Aix-Marseille III, with the mention “Cum Laude” (1998-1999). D.E.A. (Master), Institut d’Etudes Politiques de Paris with the mention “Summa Cum Laude” in the history of the 20th century (1999-2000). He won the Doctorate Competition for a three-year scholarship in Contemporary History at the Instituto Universitario Suor Orsola Benincasa, Napoleon (Cotutela Sciences Po, Paris), but gave up on his vocation as a writer (2002). He conducted several works on contemporary history and the history of political thought, including a comprehensive study of the Italian and French communist parties of the 1950s and 1960s and of the French philosopher Raymond Aron and Jean-Paul Marat. In a biographical essay, Philippe Palini confesses that “between the ages of 22 and 28, I have been studying like a madman day and night, sacrificing my literary vocation […] actually assumed for four or five years.”

The book is a great deal about communication, about how it is constructed. About what we pay attention to during communication and what goes beyond our consciousness, and which is five times more important, about the nonverbal side, without words. In communication, we express what we want to say (but also what we do not want to) in the form of gestures, mimics, positions, movements, intonation, and, last but not least, by using words. Since we are not aware of this important nonverbal part, we usually receive from our unconscious only messages that we do not understand well. And it is often incomprehensible to us what it was that caused tension or joy in our interlocutor.

And the problem is not to find yourself in the same condition all the time, whether it is comfortable enough, especially if you find yourself in a situation appropriate to your condition and your desires. It is not right to show up with a sweet, open smile at a funeral. In fact, it is as wrong as putting up an expression of sadness and suffering at someone’s birthday. Learn to do what is right. It is just like a key either fitting or not fitting in the lock. padlock and key: the situation is the padlock, and your condition is the key to this padlock. Here is the desirable behavioral flexibility: choose the most appropriate behaviour for that moment, as if you were choosing the key for the lock.

Vladimir Streinu belongs to a valuable generation of literary critics who, through a sustained activity, established what was later called the canon of Romanian literature. Known as the third post-Maiorescu generation, Tudor Vianu, Serban Cioculescu, Pompiliu Constantinescu, Perpessicius, and G. Călinescu published fundamental studies of Romanian criticism. A very active figure in the Romanian cultural space, especially during the period between the two world wars, Vladimir Streinu (...) urged critics to free themselves from psychology and sociology, because an artwork will set its own system of interpretative rules. Any critical approach will be focused on capturing the particularities of an author, on the “author’s individualistic feeling”, on “his fundamental sound”. Open to the nuances of the Bergsonian thought, he was convinced that any critical discourse, irrespective of method, cannot grasp the ineffable essence of an artwork; all he can do is to approximat it in some degree.

Nothing more ridiculous than the various opinions on Master Alcofibras spawning the centuries down to our time. It would be interesting to hear what he would have to say about his critical posterity, but in that case he would probably interject between his bursts of laughter some imprecation that would make us, the delicate citizens of the twentieth century, blush deeply. Ronsard sees Gargantua’s author as a jovial and eternally thirsty animal, crawling in wine mugs like a frog in the mud. This bestial picture has probably remained unsurpassed, as unbelievable are also the judgements he passed on Rabelais.”

A spectacular book that assumes no risks, entering the little explored land of the novel. The research we are engaged in is analytical and speculative, a hypothesis that we imagine in the anteroom of simple and generally conscious truths about the 20th century novel, because these truths are yet to be said. Systematic histories, exhaustive studies in the novel of the century that recently came to an are still missing. It is also the first major difficulty that we simply had to ignore. We risk our own hypothesis in a still inadequately ordered space, and that is why it is tempting for any critical journey.

Parallel Mirrors is a collection of essays on less commented aspects of Mihai Eminescu’s fiction, drama, connections with German literature (Spielhagen, Rötscher, Lenau) of his reception in Romanian or abroad. The volume also includes the first extensive research dedicated to our literary historiography, the emergence and circulation of the “national poet” formula attributed to Eminescu. The character Toma Nour is not easy to decipher, does not reveal itself under the reader’s eyes, as, for example, Bolintineanu’s Manoil does. It enters into a ready-made history, and the text of the novel means more a detailing of the elements that go into the making of a character at the end of his life, a character ending up as destiny. He is narrating himself objectively, and between himself and his own life there is a sense of detachment, but which does not also lead to a knowledge of the causes. The character is recognized and accepted from the very beginning to be a “desolate genius”, refusing the dialogue with others, because he loves himself enormously... Eminescu is scrutinizing the various faces of Eros, creating a kind of mysticism of eroticism

Is today’s thinking conditioned by body-mind dualism? A rebellion against the biological order seems to have silently infiltrated our world view. Suicide bombers appear to share the fascination with destruction, of writers such as Mishima, Pasolini and Foucault. A liberation from the body to re-establish a – possibly mystical – union of soul and cosmos and an assertion of the mind’s omnipotence appear to be common features of forms of behaviour that seem to be taken for granted in contemporary thought. Is the new misogyny, which rejects motherhood in the name of feminism, contributing in any way to these trends? This review of our society by a woman psychoanalyst – a non-medic and graduate of the Institut d'Études Politiques in Paris – presents a sharp and rigorous analysis of the strange and violent mechanisms that are erupting in the world today.

The supreme samples of a somnambulistic poetic discourse, which subvert not only the grammatical but also the poetic logic and syntax, these Elegies are, I think, a peak, if not a monument of modern European spirituality. I am happy that the Romanian language of my ancestors and of the great Romanian poets has accommodated and managed to encompass the art of the Austrian poet, which vivifies the word in an unbearable tension between Pindar and Hölderlin – a peak of the European tradition beyond compare.” (Nicolae Breban)

“The reader will have the surprise to discover here a new Stendhal, a Stendhal of political history. He wrote these, unfortunately, unfinished, notes about Napoleon, in two stages with a period of almost twenty years between them. All that he wrote during these two periods was gathered under the general title of Napoleon in two volumes. The first volume, Napoleon’s Life, was written in Milan in 1817-1818; the second is entitled Testimonies about Napoleon in Paris in 1836-1837. It should not, however, be thought that Beyle (who joined Napoleon as an officer in the German campaign, Henry Beyle chosing his penname from the small town of Stendhal, where he spent a long time) only engaged in writing under the impulse of events, animated by his enthusiasm or admiration for Napoleon, and under the disappointment at seeing in France such a great lack of gratitude for such a man. No, his desire to be a historian, I would not dare say his vocation, goes back for some time. In his first Frimaire of year XI (November 22, 1802), in the midst of the poetic passion characteristic of the age, he noted in his book the project of undertaking three works in prose: The History of Bonaparte, History of the Revolution and The History of the Great People Who lived during the French Revolution. And, with great wisdom, he adds: “These three works are to be started at age of thirty-five, that is, fifteen years from now.” [...] Stendhal is also one of the first historians to highlight the moral principle that sustained the official facade of the regime, the first empire being helped by this emulation that testified to the same satisfactions, to the same need to shine, to make itself noticeable, to distinguish itself at any cost. Collective passion for which he gave us telling examples. The Empire brought these feelings into being not only among the French, but also among all the peoples where Napoleon was taking his armies. Italy's response, in particular, has never been more subtly analyzed than he did.” (Henri Martineau)

A huge amount of different forms, types and means of influence are exerted by man and over man – conviction, constraint, suggestion, contamination – as well as methods and processes, techniques and technologies of influence. Each of these influences, having their specifics and possibilities, acquires a complete embodiment only by realizing the current tasks and conditions of the activity and the communication in which they manifest themselves. Their opportunity and efficiency depend on the choice of an appropriate strategy, tactics and instrumentation in absolutely concrete circumstances.

Of particular importance is the knowledge of the laws and the mastery, through practical methods, of the organization of the psychological influence in those spheres of activity, where the leading role is played by the process of interpersonal communication. These are, above all, the various fields of psychological, managerial, pedagogical, marketing and advertising practice. It is precisely the psychological influence that forms and characterizes the potential transformer of communication as the activity of the person. Problems related to the possibility and tendency to use psychological influence to achieve their goals appear to professionals in the most diverse fields of activity. They mainly refer to the need to choose psychological means, processes and methods that are effective in psychological influence. A reference book in the field of psychology. An indispensable textbook.
The fashion of the day is to lose weight without having low diets in calories and starvation, but with more enjoyable methods. Increasingly popular, for example, is the enjoyment of dance, thalassotherapy, and massage, which can help you get rid of excess weight and can strengthen your muscles. Unwanted kilos can be escaped, as Chinese reflexotherapists claim, and with special breathing exercises. So, not regular exercises, but exercises that enhance metabolic processes, regulate the functioning of the stomach, and remove the fat creases from the hips. It’s not at all necessary to get your body back with hard diets and to feed yourself with expensive dietary supplements. In order to remove extra pounds, it is sometimes enough to change the way you feed and the whole lifestyle, the more frequent consumption of tasty diets, proper breathing and body care. How are they possible without unnecessary effort and without much money, you can find out reading this book. In addition, it includes valuable information about the content of calories and nutrients in a range of foods, about the correct weight-to-weight ratio, about our energy consumption, and how we can eliminate some hardships and harmful stereotypes.

There is probably no man in this world who has not even thought about the eternal questions of the functioning of the world. The duality of the world, this eternal struggle between Good and Evil, the dissipating truth, the mythical triumph of Justice... How many times did each of us say loudly or in thought sacramental phrases such as: “What good Is This to Me? “,” It’s unfair! “. Whenever we heard about terrible events, we witnessed true tragedies, and it was easy to understand that heavenly punishment does come down upon men for no reason at all. What was wrong with a five-year-old child suffering from leukemia or a young man who trampled on a mine? What harm had done the three hundred passengers of the plane that crashed against the rocks of a mountain? How are does one account for the thousands of absurd deaths occurring suddenly and for no reason at all? I have only heard and always considered that everything is paid for, that sooner or later good will triumph over evil and that the world by its nature is harmonious. Is that so?

Larisa Renar writes in an easy and natural way in a world where energy forces and waves do not play a less important role than the exchange rate, where relationships are not simply formed, on the contrary, they are skillfully constructed according to psychological laws, and where legends get a real referent. Women’s energetic practices are presented for the first time so fascinatingly and in a particularly efficient way. Aphrodite recovered its power in the 21st century, and Larisa Renar’s book, Secrets of Seduction, is the most telling proof thereof.
I am glad to know that this book has been remarked and taken into consideration for being published in Romania. I remember the words of Sergei Dovlatov, a Russian writer who travelled to America: “Every journalist dreams of writing a novel.” There is a grain of truth in this allegation... It’s hard to find a journalist who, din his spare time, did not try to write a novel, stories or poems... The editorial principle runs like this: “Write in such a manner that the one who reads will have nightmares at night!” Everything seemed extraordinary... The exit from the common world is also the story between the covers of this book.

A powerful, expressive, dark novel. A bestseller that ran in tens of thousand copies, ranking among the most demanded books of the year.

To all these questions, the new President of the Republic, Nicolas Sarkozy, replied affirmatively on behalf of “national identity”. The historical inquiry allows us to respond differently. A polemic and dramatic book. A fundamental study of current problems, apparently without solution.

The room was fully seated. I was facing the parents who were trying to understand and act. They were more willing to acknowledge their shortcomings than their virtues, but they are ready to listen and confess. Everything was discussed: the order in the room, the diet, the use of the bath, the love deceptions, the music, the fun... Mothers talked about their helplessness, the fact that they no longer recognize their darling offsprings in their unexpected metamorphosis. Fathers, disconcerted at seeing their daughters, who have reached puberty, adorning their navel with rings and tattoos, admitted they were losing their patience. In fact, everyone was talking about themselves, about their troubles, about their need for help and support in order to solve the problems of their relationships with teenagers, problems that arise every day. One couple, however, astonished me. They seemed destitute, clinging to each other like children. The problem was that their two major sons had “seized” the house, and parents were compelled to obey the tyrannical rules imposed on them by the new “masters”...

A book about difficult children, the so-called problem-children. Here are a some useful tips for parents.

Ianosi is alive, attentive and excited about any problem as if he were now just coming in, leaning slightly beneath the high portic of Knowledge. Curiously, practicing that “double” curiosity, rare today – about the “problem”, but also about the one who raises it. Interrogating Being. At times like this, when the North Star of fixed values seems to have gone elsewhere, in other centuries or to other continents, Romanian culture is lucky to boast a researcher, a professor and the governor of a cultural platform, both August and apparently contradictory. One of the few survivors of that sapiential Mitteleuropa, of those in love with the mysteries of art and thought, one of those rare scholars, today and in Europe, crossing the historical and mental boundaries, rigid for commoners, with such grace and ease that can deceive us into forgetting the suffering and labour, the unique tenacity that only the presence of an “ideal” can explain. Here is where we can find Ideal or Model, hen we feel lost among our own hesitations and failures.” (Nicolae Breban)

“Ianos is a man for whom the moral problem exists, and this fact puts him in a highly fertile and necessary posture as a mediator. In a world that is becoming more and more controversial, sometimes stupid, totally superficial and aberran,, Ion Ianoi thinks he can give us a lesson in diminishing conflict. I can see in this lesson and in his person a model of serenity, of intellectual sincerity, of Europeanity.” (Mircea Martin)
“... the Janosi style; a unique style in Romanian culture. In his case, we cannot speak of just pedagogic, dry erudition, but of books written with great literary talent, I think, and with extraordinary recalling capacities.” (Gabriel Dimisianu)

“I said on other occasions, I also wrote on other occasions that Ion Ianosi is a gift to Romanian literature. Do we have the power to enjoy this gift? Do we have the power to honour and marvel at him, as we should? Among our Romanian writers, our friend is perceived as an atypical Jewish-Hungarian scholar. Among the Jews, he is treated as a born Romanian. In Janosi, I see a first-rate model, a great scholar who was born in Romanian literature, a writer who would honour any major culture of the world. Janosi is then an agreat show, despite himself and his self-willed way of being.” (Aura Christi)

Of course, we have not changed anything in point of contents, but some articles have been extended by new insertions, and the bibliography has been significantly enriched. This is a Masonic Dictionary. We limited ourselves to Masonry stricto sensu, but in a very wide acceptation. By the logic of things we had to proceed along three directions: first of all, the need to dedicate an entry to every country in the world where Masonry exists. As always, history explains the present. Rite, Masonic or not, comes from the abyss of time... “ (Daniel Ligou)

Pragmatic conservatism, David Hume's conservatism, Edmund Burke, and Michael Oakeshott’s twentieth century, are profoundly different from reactionism and virulent ultraconservatism. A pragmatic conservative is a man who thinks without guiding myths and without absolute truths, confiscating and paralyzing intelligence; he is an adversary, not an adept, of inverse utopias, aspiring to restore the past. He is a follower of moderation and gradualism – not because he is horrified by profound changes, but because he knows that nothing important, rooted in a form of human life, can be suddenly changed. There is often a confusion between pragmatic conservatism and right radicalism. But this is an unforgivable error, because the two forms of the Right are in polarity.” Hostility to radicalism, the incessant, implacable hostility, is the essential definition of conservatism.” (Robert Cecil, Marquis of Salisbury). There were also famous figures in Romania close to pragmatic conservatism, for example P. P. Carp. Unfortunately, the native tradition is dominated by right-wing radicalism, illustrated (storming version) by Eminescu and (serene version) by Maiorescu, and later by the “lost generation”: Nae Ionescu, Mircea Eliade, Cioran and Noica. There are also artists in this pageant of the “magnificent lovers” of Bucharest in the old times. An example thereof is the story of Eminescu-Caragiale’s rivalry over Veronica Micle or the story of the double passion of architect Alexandru Oraşcu – for his wife Elena Marcovici and for her hometown that he dreamed of raising from ashes and ruins. A Bucharest of Aphrodite and of Eros (as the reputation of the city went in the Phanariot age, according to Greek monk Daponte) was not to be imagined without the evocation of the famous balls in the Shutu Palace and without the evocation of the couple, Grigore and Irina Sutu – judges of the elegance, hospitality and courtesy of the nineteenth century.

“Published in 1910, Rilke’s novel is an indisputable peak. States are here, everywhere, described exactly, slowly, alive, vividly; yes, the rhythms flow gradually, changing their breathing, and offering surprises from one line to the next; the unusual is the natural frame of this atypical, tense novel for the habits of the house – if we admit that an epic text can be like a house, like a fortress like a continent or planets barely discovered – unpredictable, and once again: unpredictable. Everything is unusual, new, everything is marked by the exceptional inevitable seal, at the head of a supposed list where I can invent the exceptional stand, both Malte’s attempts to tame the unknown, to forge, to work in the depths of his own becoming self and of his characters’ which are part of this “ferocious connaisseur of the inner world” (Witold Gombrowicz): Malte, Maman, Sieversen, Dad – “God’s hunting master”-, Sophie (Malte’s feminine double), the maid in the house, the servant with silverware, pastor Dr. Jespersen, Count
Christian Brahe, Mathilde Brahe, little Erik, old Countess Margarete Brigge, Malte’s grandmother who “must have been a great lady,” the Abelone, the Chamberlain, the unicorn... Even the life of Ulsgaard, thanks to the Rlkeen pen, turns miraculously into a kind of background character, now life-sized (as little Malte discovers his own hand as a foreign one), then pale, lying in a sort of laziness at seven in the evening, which Little Malta begins to get used to only because he learns, while having dinner, how to study others.” (Aura Christi)

This book is an almost academic study, woven around the description of Judas’ personality, assembled systematically from fragments of the accepted gospels. The author tries to elucidate the mystery surrounding the betrayal of Jesus Christ, advancing the idea of sacrifice meant to serve a superior absolute goal, and arguing that the justification of the act of betrayal lies in the fidelity to a supreme, fully assumed cause. It is, therefore, the deeply original interpretation of the betrayal mechanism in the name of a superior ideal.

This lover’s discourse is structured in terms that belong to philosophy or aesthetics, being grafted on the discourse structure of the most prestigious myth of poetry: the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice. This myth represents the framework of a phenomenology of search and knowledge of Being, which casts light into the depth of the phenomenology of the work of art. The author starts from the premise that the meaning of a work can only be sought and known within the horizon of Being. The lyrical poem that restricts the theoretical and critical approach of the work can speak not only of the presence but also of the absence of Being, in other words, both of what it is and of what is not Being. Any phenomenology eventually becomes ontology. The hermeneutical trajectories cross the paths of poets such as Eminescu, Barbu, Arghezi, Nichita.

“In this book, I am in fact trying to exchange my tools and the manner in which I write literary criticism. That’s because the very condition of literary criticism has changed. From a diurnal genre that reached its highest peak in the 1960s and 1980s when it became the dominant genre of literature – criticism has become an almost subversive discipline, practiced in secret (in the University) or in obscure places (literary magazines with a diminutive run of copies). Criticism has therefore turned into a nocturnal genre, practiced by “lunatics” and accessible only to them. Young writers refuse the diagnosis, the elders are upset if they are not overtly lauded, and the media mock criticism, emphasizing in any event the superiority (and the advantages) of advertising, in relation to the wretched value judgment. And this, because that splendid explosion of reading methods, critical forms and ways from previous decades has actually dried out the discipline. It multiplied the possibilities of interpretation, until the meaning of the literary text became totally obscure and, indeed, even optional. Everything is questioned, and the once sacred aesthetic value, enshrined by modernist criticism, has been long discarded by the critical discourse. Which discourse begins to resemble a deep night, in which, like a pale star, the leftovers of confidence flicker here and there.” (Răzvan Voncu)
Being Romanian? “It’s a shame!” exclaimed Cioran. To what extent was the philosopher living in his Paris exile right? What does “being Romanian” mean in a false transition that apparently does not end? These and many other questions are being addressed by writer Ionel Necula in this opus, which sums up the analyses of obvious social turns and twists recorded over the last seventeen years. Not always comfortable, the corrosive spirit of the author speaks his mind, sometimes having incendiary accents.

This is a collection of studies and essays that interrogate the controversial relationship in contemporary science between comparative and germanistic studies, namely the new paradigm of “intercultural germanism” in the spirit of which are approached older and newer German writers or aesthetic problems. Exciting are the open perspectives of investigating Faustian phenomenology in the hermeneutics of Ernst Bloch and Constantin Noica. Of equal interest is the research of Lucian Blaga’s work in a German context and on Heidegger and his political implications. Reflecting the double direction that all the volumes of Vasile Voia are taking, the present book is pointing to a depth dimension and, of course, we could speak of its uniqueness in our present culture. It combines ingeniously a comparison of ideas with aesthetics and philosophy, realizing interference and unity at the top level of critical discourse.

Before anything else, the Poetry of the Gândirea Journal is a book about the weakness of concepts. How do I define today words like traditionalism or modernism? Between the wars, the terms would probably polarize all disputes, leaving nothing in the state of neutrality. It’s not ideologies that do literature. And when it comes to poetry, things are all the more complicated. Looking back with suspicion, Mircea A. Diaconu undertakes not only a comparative description of the main constants of Gândirea poetry but also an anatomy – at least skeptical – of the concepts in their dispute with the reality in the act. Critics of concepts – coupled with an attempt to redeem them – respond to a thorough, non-prismatic analysis of reality. Within this distance, between concept and reality, does the eye of both the historian and the literary critic penetrate. And what follows is no longer a sum of apodictic truths, but a hermeneutical questioning.

Marina Tsvetaeva can be distinguished by a personal accent, not only in poetry, but also in fiction. It is her nervous, abrupt, syncopated styling, even unmistakable spelling, with multiple lines of pause or unusual interlaces of brackets, exclamations, and so on. So what word could convey the particularity of this creation? I told her: a pathetic state. I could say: a feverish state. I told her: radicality. I can add: Frenzy. Both Tsvetaeva’s life and work throws one in a state of emergency. They are constantly repudiating average, mediocre, everyday, well-behaved situations. [...] If excess can endanger life, it can also save art. Excessive here is an overwhelming gift of affection, a hypertrophy of attachment. It is like a hyperbole of man, as proof of his regained dignity: the subhuman passes through art into the sublime. Believing in art, Tsvetaieva believes in humanity, in the chance of mankind’s palpable immortality. However, it is from the vicinity of death that Tsvetaeva draws the eventuality of transgressing it; from an endless life endangered by absolutism. Life is not lived as art, we cannot force it into the measureless! – that could be her creed, her last message.

Ali Ildarâmoglu is a renowned writer and journalist from Azerbaijan, one of the veterans of national literature, the author of dozens of books, which brought him a well-deserved success in the country. The novel The Reward is the last of the master’s epic creations – a story full of dramatic events, whose main protagonists are the inhabitants of a mountain village in Azerbaijan, and whose action takes place in the times of the Stalinist era. This work asserts, in a manner that is permeated by an elevated civic pathos and lyricism, the ancient moral ideals of the Azerbaijani people.

Probably heard from his father, “living in Bucharest, the Udricani slum, between 1838-1844”, the fairytale was first published by Petre Ispirescu in Țăranul român, no. 11 of 1862 under the title “Prince Charming’s Story, or Youth without Aging”, signed P.I. It would be reprinted in Unirea, year II, 1862 and, a year later, in Voix Roumanie, Bucharest, year III 1863, no. 20 under the title La jeunesse sans la viellesse et la vie sans la mort. However, our pages reproduce the ne varietur version of this fairy tale by Petre Ispirescu, Works I, under the editorship, with notes and variants by Aristija Avramescu.

The introductory study – “Prince Charming and and the Forgotten Time” – and the glosses on the margins of the text are complementary. The annotations capitalize on the acquisitions of contemporary exegesis, and the preface proposes alternatives to the known interpretations, also present in the critical sequences ordered in a sui-generis anthology. Biobibliography rounds up our commented edition by inventing, starting with 1872, all fairy-tale editions and by recording the main critical texts.

“Why without Minotaur? Because literature, from my point of view, is a labyrinth, and the advancement into it, one full of dangers, but melted into pure iridescence. A labyrinth, but a radiant one, meant to draw attention to the infinity of games hidden in the literary text. Games that catch you (or better said, seduce you) only to set your free, for you to be seen in the middle, addressing a triumphant greeting – maybe to some unseen friends. With nothing else but hot stones, incrusted with gems.” (Simona-Grazia Dima)

“The history of the Abderites is artistically superior to the history of Agathon, being savored by the underlying irony, by the grotesque situation, by the implied humor. This work anticipates less a Thomas Mann or Robert Musil (as Fritz Martini remarks) than a Günter Grass. Like all the satirical works of the “age of enlightenment,” also this one has lost at least part of its “message” by altering the state of things or the spirit. Which does not mean that satire is without address. Democritus in the midst of the Abderites, here is the man of conscience, of the high sensation, the will of the better one in the “ship of the fools”, to use the image launched by Sebastian Brant. Admirable for the grotesque representation of human stupidity is the story of the “process of the donkey shadow” in the fourth book of the Abderites. This story is a learning book of wisdom from which, however, mankind has learned nothing.” (Nicolae Balota)

In the context of a critical shortage of reference books, the monograph of the great scholar Nicolae Balota about German literature is a model for the analysis of one of the most important cultures in the world.

The Street – a peak of liveliness, a mirror of the time and of social structures.

The Street, which speaks, hears, sees, imposes, excludes, lives, tells stories. Having stored a certain past, it is a document. The street is the one that does politics. The guillotines were installed in the street. It was in the streets that the Marseillaise was sung. At a crossroads of streets, there was a stone platform at Cape Town, formerly the Slave Square. The street is the triumph or defeat. It is the official recognition of the power or of the opposition. There are innocents in the streets. This is where the demonstrators’ columns pass. The street can be joyous and it can be sad. It can be a song or a booze. The streets are dancing in Rio. It is in the streets that Piazzola’s music is played in Buenos Aires. The African-Caribbean festival takes place in the Havana streets. The street is the great sign of national identity. At the same time, it is the big world. Where everything happens, good and evil, ugly and beautiful, emotional, rational, mugging and murder, wedding and funeral, piccina music and cannon projectiles. So I invite you to celebrate the street together. Let us jointly write an essay of our day. Everything belongs to us and will testify about us. Everything that means the street show we participate, consciously or unconsciously. We share in everything that goes under the show in the streets heading. Everything falls within the ken of the one who knows how to look. Everything that humanity has created, destroyed, affirmed or contradicted (as well as the germs of its future), lies exposed or hidden at a corner of the street.

As a columnist of the Le Monde newspaper, he has greatly contributed to the popularization of Romanian literature in France. Rachel is the story of a Jewish family with a branch in Romania and another in France. Both branches of the family go through the Second World War and the post-war reversals, each in its own way. The main heroes, he, from France, she, from Romania, eventually meet in an African country that everybody tries to help in some way or other. Rachel is the story of a strong, strange love affair between the two cousins coming from extremely different worlds.

Dobicin assumed that life, seen at a distance measured by the stretched-out arm, is precisely that substance which must, first of all, be related to universal harmony, but also to the cataclysms of the world. His latest story, “Shurah’s Relatives”, came out in post-Sovietism (1993), its ending being brief and conclusive: the short story ends... – emblematic (for the de facto socio-national situation): “Shura thought everything out and decided that he had to go back to his old tricks.”

The edition is structured in several chapters, such as “Memories of Childhood and Youth”, “Cultural, Didactic and Political Memories”, including, among others, his correspondence with Titu Maiorescu, conferences and courses held in Vienna, Paris, Geneva, Prague, Oslo and Brussels. “Petrovici had a fractured life. At one time, he climbed up the Everest of performance and public recognition, from where, when history caught the disease of an apocalyptic ideology, he collapsed into the abyss, haunted by all sorts of silly and insane persecutions. For a long time, he deceived himself seeking the the comfort of philosophy, as the ancients had taught him, but he was overwhelmed by its descent to an ideological surrogate. Should he, after looking at the world through the opening of Plato’s cave, steal a look at it now between the barred prison windows? The new times had found him totally unprepared. His voice, which had been heard in the lecture halls of universities, in the House of Parliament, at the Academy, at glorious international meetings, was for many decades muted.” (Ionel Necula)

This is a sequel to Rilke’s early life notebooks previously published. The Florentine Journal is the earliest autobiographical note of the poet, occasioned by a journey to Dante’s town, which was committed to paper almost 20 years later. Its value lies not only in the impressions, states of mind, or the experiences of the author, but also in the fact that he reveals some of the fundamental concepts on which his entire subsequent creation would be based. He reveals the artist’s sustained obsession with his artistic destiny: “I often feel a great nostalgia about myself. I know it well, there is still a long way ahead.” The Westerwede Journal, on recalling only one year of Rilke’s existence, reveals a mix of experiences and events, such as the engagement with Clara Westhoff, but also the daily struggle for existence in the literal sense of the word. Lacking paternal financial support, he found himself forced to earn his bread doing all kinds of mean chores at various newspapers and magazines. Of course, his reflections on art, seen as a modus vivendi, are not missing: “Art is a means of individualistic loners to fulfill themselves.”

Velimir Hlebnikov’s personality is an unusual, impetuous and versatile one that combines the poet’s imagination, the scientist’s ratiocination, and the philosopher’s vision in the form of unrepeatable and exciting syntheses of an original idea. He is a sui generis innovator author of the novator sui generis who plumbs an impressive wealth of ideological, compositional possibilities. He defers to the principles of the “open work” (“otkratogo proizvedenia”), characterized by wild imagination, the free dissolution-superposition of prosodic and , linguistic layers, the unpredictability of rhetorical devices and stylistic intentions. He is unique when it comes to coining new words: for example, from the verb loved (love) he derived... 500 new words.

Besides, Hlebnikov is to be considered the author-theoretician able to predict the course of history. He even had a law of generations. He hoped, through information syntheses, to bring the methods of science closer to those of art, so as to reach a neo-mythology and a universal language. Even if the utopia is utopian, all the calculations of Hlebnikov’s calculus proved sometimes prophetic. For instance, in 1912, the poet wondered if “it is not necessary to wait until 1917 for the fall of the state?” He returns to this hypothesis two years later, publishing a register with the dates of the collapse of great empires. In 1917, instead of the name of a particular state, only “Some state” is mentioned. Moreover, he sent to A. Naraskin, minister in the Russian government, this sketchy prediction of the future which alluded to Russia and the 1917 fall of the Tsarist regime.

An applied study in the geopolitics of drugs, which, unfortunately, is one of the crucial problems of Europe. “One of the classic definitions of geopolitics – the study of power conflicts to control territories, their wealth and the human communities that produce them – can be successfully applied to the geopolitics of drugs. Indeed, three of the four major illicit drug families, derived from coca, cannabis and poppy, come from cultures that can reach 150,000 ha. In the case of heroine and cocaine, clandestine drug-processing laboratories, which have a high added value in relation to the actual production of coca and poppy, are most often located in the vicinity of cultivated areas. Synthetic drugs are an exception inasmuch as the raw material used (and chemically obtained) is manufactured not far from the consumption sites. The geopolitical stake in their marketing is therefore much lower.”

“G. Bacovia is the highest point of Romanian symbolism, ranking at the same time, in point of excellence, above symbolism any beyond any narrow confines of some literary trend, exerting a universal appeal. His influence on 20th century poetry has remained a blank page of our literary history. It is uncommon as it is paradoxical: the poet with the deepest echo in modern Romanian poetry is isolated in his strange, inimitable, beauty.” (Nicolae Manolescu)

“The Bacovian text is, in Derrida’s sense, an absence / death of the subject, the meaningless meaning that only signifies its emptiness. Selfreflection means the lack of referentiality, a lack in life, content, in referential content. In other words, the poet’s infinite monologue is a monologue in which the poet is absent. (...) The Bacovian spirit is eminently a modern spirit by changing the perspective on writing which is not just text, but a subtext, which is not a final product but pure tension that fuels the crisis of creation by stimulating the dislocation and structural disintegration of the return to the genetic point. Being modern means being fastidious, unfinished, open; what fascinates the modern is what Roland Barthes understands by the zero degree of writing, meaning antilanguage, silent communication.” (Mihai Cimpoi)

I believe in the audience’s sensitivity to a drama of ideas, but also to a drama of action faithful to the classical forms. At the risk of being considered a mannerist, I accept this label if I choose as models
Montherlant, Camus, Vallejo or Camil Petrescu. I have tried to deal with one of the great themes of world drama, which began in ancient Greece and ended up in the neoclassic French theater: the conflict between duty and passion. Drama occurs when the two imperatives become divergent and it can still be found today from the great political leaders to the common people. But to illustrate it, I chose the historical drama version, because (to quote Henri Rochefort) “the future is so bleak at the moment that I felt like feeding on the past for a while.” The drama of my characters, be it Ugo or Prince Rudolf, is the failure of trying to find a link, to reconcile them.

I saw in Rudolf of Habsburg a real prophet of the modern world... who predicted all the catastrophes of the 20th century and tried to steer Austrian politics in another direction. But his private life, far from being a model, defied this plan. He disappeared because he did not find his place in his world, while Ugo d’Este accepted the end for the same reason. “Making a home requires will and understanding, much more will the making of a world necessitate. Now, I think Mousuel Ceatpat had genius. However, the circumstances were unfavorable to him. My memories of his project are lost in the shadows of the Temple dug up, in the hercinic rock in time immemorial by nature, by the primitive people, or by the saints drawn to up to the roof of the dome in their endeavor to communicate with a world above. The Temple of the Great One, Bai Ulghun, as it is remembered from ancient times, is a huge cavern hidden to sight in the heart of the high gorgon covered with raspberries and hazelnuts among the groves. Its calothy, open to the world by a tremendous trench, allows access inside the winding trail of a ladder dug in the stone temple to the architrav encircling the naos. From here, you can reach the main platform much easier, on a solid oak staircase, descending into seven-foot bends, around asustaining pillar, to the place where everything happens: sacrifices, imprecations, prayers. All around, dividing space and time sequentially, on the concave surface of the platform, twelve thin ditches start in rays, like the spins of a wheel joining at a virtual point in the middle of the square hatch, opposed to the rounded garret of the roof, and prolonged under the floor of the naos, leading to a suspected hut, thus uniting the sky with the earth.” (Ileana Cudalb)

The dismantling of the secret mechanisms of the real universe is done in these texts with little display of rhetorical devices, but used appropriately and rigorously, with almost geometric precision. The author employs often the convention of the dream vision without, however, plunging into surreal landscapes, sheer absurdity, or fantasizing for the sake of fantasy. The detailed description of reality, crossed here and there by a discrete poetic thrill, is not an end in itself either, but serves as a certificate of authenticity, lends coherence to the ideas governing the whole architecture. It is a dense prose, yet easy to read, for an audience desirous to meditate for a while after closing a book.

In recent years, more and more people are addressing doctors to treat sterility. It is believed that more than 70 percent of sterile couples used the doctor’s advice and about half of them followed at least one treatment. It is possible that the number of sterile individuals is still higher, because some couples do not consider sterility a problem and do not turn to specialists. However, only half of those addressing the doctor can be helped, and only after a thorough examination. Most often, pregnancy occurs within one year of treatment, but sometimes “wonders” are also expected to happen after 10 years. Often, wives start on the difficult path of investigations and long-term treatments that require effort, nerves, and obviously resources, but they are not always successful. However, the goal deserves to continue trying and not stopping until all possible means have been exhausted.

This is a series of works that will come forth under the auspices of the Dictionaries & Encyclopaedias. 100 Series, in view of which we have concluded a contract with the VECE publishing house in Moscow – one of the most prestigious publishing houses in Russia. The Moscow collection contains over 100 volumes, of which we first selected the works included in this project. We mention that each edition benefits from information that practically covers all countries, personalities in the world, taking into account history, the history of literature, culture and European science; and not only. Among the authors are scientists, psychologists, historians, musicians, writers, university professors etc.
The project is of obvious use, each title being a disguised textbook, intended not only for the specialists but also for the general public. Depending on the volume, these dictionaries contain information about the most prominent people of genius, famous books, great composers, great musicians, great enigmas of history, hundreds of Nobel laureates, 100 major cities of the world, great Jews, puzzles of the 20th century, etc. Due to the lack of sufficient dictionaries in the context of Romanian culture, we believe that this project, carried out under conditions of maximum efficiency, professionalism and excellent media coverage, can be the beginning of a special remedial program in this field, unfortunately, poorly represented.

How to choose from a huge number of remarkable personalities the hundred greatest ones? It must be said from the outset that the unequivocal resolution of this problem is virtually impossible. The word “genius” has been emptied out of meaning because of its overuse, has lost its clear meaning. How could it be interpreted? Philosopher and poet Vladimir Soloviov gave the following explanation: “Genius”, from “genus” – originally meant the spirit of a deceased ancestor, glorified). Today, a man called a genius may refer to: 1) having a distinct inner life with a rich potential, and 2) a man whose activity has not only a personal significance but also a general one (for the people or for the whole of humanity). Genius, as a superior level of endowment, is comparable to talent, and at a lower step does not have a clear definition; even this distinction is relative, exact differentiation attempts are arbitrary and their application controversial. “[…] genius is a notion with a great degree of mystery, partially subjective. In addition, it is far too elusive. It will be easier for the reader to form an opinion after reading this book.

“...I’m leafing through the pages of this book picking up passages at random, in a little ghostly game. Like the verses of the Psalms, someone would say. No, infinitely more discreetly, : in a low voice, without presumptions. I hold in my (wet) hands one of the most risky novels that Romanian literature has produced in recent years. Here and now, feverish, lively. Profoundly inaccurate and atypical.” (Diana Adamek)

Diana Adamek has written a sensual novel, overdetermined by the abundance of images in synaesthetic opulence, casting layers of color over the Egyptian stone blocks, burying in vegetation the right walls of the narrative, triggering a chromatic avalanche that will absorb the formal rigidities in its flow. The details are not considered for the sake of completing the structure, digressions are not sacrificed for the sake of supra-formal harmonies; on the contrary, the geography of the novel is fluid, unexpected, labyrinthic, open to caprices and the senses.

“...Did Eugen Ionescu really hate his father, or only in the diatribes written by a great writer full of whims? Why would I hate my father? A country boy, signed-up in the gendarmerie, my father was handsome and natural. Perhaps he was attracted to women who were not for him: he lost his job because of a dispute with an officer ranking higher in the hierarchy over the favours of a beautiful country-side girl.

His mother, of a quick and domineering temper, was perhaps not the best life companion for him. God give them rest and peace for having reached enough harmony..."
to bring me into the world! Their divisiveness and reconciliations gave variety and dynamism to my childhood.

Why did I publish my mother’s notebook? Out of admiration for her writing and her story, which must be taken into consideration in themselves, regardless of her son’s existence! Maybe out of the “moral duty” of bringing to the attention of those interested in my works the proof of my deep-seated duties to my first and most important master. I did not take anything from my little-schooled mother: I took over the style itself, the flow of the sentence.” (Ilie Constantin)

Cassian Maria Spiridon is a fervent master of the lyrical fragment, the concentrate capable of fixing poetry. The space and time of the verb are thus counterfeit to the minimal sign of the substance, pursued in the Ungarettian direction of fugitive contacts of the inner universe with the outer one, surrounded by the magic of silence. Beyond any development, felt parasitic, the fragment is sovereign as the privileged place of poetry. If Paul Valéry asserts that the deepest part of man is his skin, we understand the sensory level alarm, the strain of the senses for the real integration of the being. This leads to a poetics of the senses. It restores the concrete in its rights to the worldly image of the world. Cassian Maria Spiridon lives lyrical through the concrete, replacing the sublimation of his inner experiences through a cut-off guided by contemplative acuity. (Gheorghe Grigurcu)

The individual position of a Cassian Maria Spiridon, internalized, divided, and inquisitive (after a frustrated childhood), involves polarized states, accents of pride and attempted (failed) initiation into a shadowless humanism. Some of his older contemporaries are close to him. (...) By highlighting, giving priority to cerebralism and axially fitting into the psycho-neurotic flow of his time, Cassian Maria Spiridon opposes decorative and transparency the signs of a troubled inner life. His poetry, idealized lyricism, is the high-ceremonial diary of a melancholy of extreme lucidity. (Constantin Ciopraga)

“It is possible to communicate and it is necessary to communicate with the values of world literature, preserving a historical perspective, reading Sophocles as Pericle’s contemporary. But we have begun to understand, in contrast to the last century of New Historicism that as necessary, or even more fertile, is the communication with the past, while adopting an up-to-date perspective, reading Sophocles as our contemporaries. Beyond this perspective, which ultimately is somewhat historicist, except for the fact that history is localized in the present, another perspective opens up in line with literary synchronism that urges us to read Sophocles as nobody’s or everyone’s contemporary, as bearing witness to human essence and not only to a provisional historical existence. An ambitious attempt, which strives to de-relativize the literary-artistic values, while enforcing the consciousness of a relativity of the forms and figures that a hermeneutic of texts is supposed to bring to light. A relativity imposed even by the presence of the author, as interpreter, writer and hermeneutic subject in his comments. In this book about so many books, the scribe-performer appears in his texts like the painter who painted himself in his own paintings. Let this last vanity be forgiven.” (Nicolae Balotă)

“The true power, writes young scholar Balotă, is in power without glory, in hidden power, in concealed fecundity. Nothing is manifest, the seed is buried deep. In the seed’s sleep there is power without glory. Its very passivity is fruitful. The harvest, the late glory of the seed beyond its horizon. The seed is strong during its underground agony. “ These notes – which can be considered an indirect manifesto – were written in January 1955 [...] It is captivating The incursion from the ‘91 –’98s into the gloomy ’54 –’55 year is fascinating. The lucid eye of the erudite Balotă “looks” at the youth of that time, judges him, treats him with love, with understanding, with sa scholarțs envy. An effect of estrangement is thus released; it’s like moving through a labyrinth of time, a labyrinth that has mirrors instead of walls. While you see different real faces in the mirror, you burden them with a memorable description, and in just a few moments you have the chance to see the same living faces, described by the same spirit... what experience has accumulated from the first diary to the first segment of time – almost forty years. Overwhelming the harshness of this guru turned against himself, acknowledging the fact that the underground war had started several decades before; The Master is faithful to himself, he is imperiously feeding on the misery of any self-conquest (Nietzsche). Again, by touching an ideal – says Kant – we enjoy “an individual thing, determinable or even determined only by the idea”. Nicolae Balotă surpasses it by exemplifying, inventing ideals that disseminate spells of holy mystery. (Lucian Blaga)

“We recall the words of Rainer Maria Rilke about generations with a mixture of amazement and fear; thus, the author of the Duino Elegies, known to have been written over a decade – claims that three generations have succeed one another cyclically:

1) the one who finds God;
2) the one who builds temples;
3) the one that plucks stones from built-up temples to build up huts.

Now, overcoming the amazement, the fear, I endorse the same allegations that were once made, things I am almost certain of when I am alone: I do not know if I have found God; when it seems to me that I feel close to him, I lose him, I doubt him, I “argue” with him, I imagine psalms in a rush; I wish / I want to believe. I’m not sure I will have the strength to build my own temple in words. But I know I will not pull out stones from foreign temples to build huts. This safety, even if fragile, even if backed up, is being earned progressively, and may be the sign of a beginning. On my publisher’s request, I collected these dialogues, selected from a few others, written in time, in a book, as they are signs of a passage, signs of the sustained effort to build a destiny; a literary one, of course. I do not know whether these dialogues, shaped in the exercises of destiny, on Ignatius de Loyola’s trail, in the footsteps of St. Augustine, are convincing; for me they remain subsumed under Unamuno’s hunger of being. Which probably is not insignificant. It is clear, however, that time, criticism, readers will judge if these exercises resist can pass the test of time; in fact, they are the signs of a literary destiny.”

There are, of course, difficult themes or, in Dostoevsky’s words, impossible. I am surprised at the courage to approach them. Since Aurea Christi’s notebooks – part of which was originally published in two volumes (Three Thousand Characters and The Hunger of Being) – have about a thousand pages, they were redistributed, at the publisher’s suggestion, in several volumes. The title, Three Thousand Characters (“Ideea Europeană” Publishing, 2007), – revised and enlarged edition – remained the same, while The Hunger of Being (published by “Contemporanul” Publishing House, 2010) is now entitled “Apollo’s Rib”. Polemical texts were relegated to a separate volume. We passed the Academy, in whose garden we admired old chestnuts and so proud, Oh, Lord! , in their solitude, laid bare in the middle of the city. I watched the way in which – hesitating as if it was only my imagination – chestnuts were falling down; listening to that childish and serious snap, which made me thing of fulfillment, there, at the end of the road. I stopped at the place. It was a clear day; a light wind was blowing in late September, with dark eyes. A September like an old man with wrinkles about his eyes. After a strange fall, no chestnuts seemed to move; each fruit remained in the place assigned to it during the fall; yes, every chestnut tree had its place, as if known before being planted in a hole in the asphalt along the asymmetric alleys, or on the earth covered with leaves of rotten yellow, forgotten, yellow. Looking at those chestnuts, I wanted my poems, essays and prose to enjoy the same, wonderful, chance: may each word fall on the page and stay in the texture of the phrase, as if they had been there forever. Therefore, my role lies in the patient dexterity of assisting words, like Joseph, the child of the fountain and of fortune, helped the wind in the palm tree garden of the Pharaoh’s friend, Putifar. A serious hermeneutical attempt, carried out in the depths of the Ionesco’s works and demonstrating convincingly that “In Ionesco’s first play, English without a Teacher, communication is repetitive and alienating. The recurrence of clichés of the bourgeois language is the effect (cause) of an ossified existence. Alienation begins by being peaceful and ending in aggression. At first, the elderly Smiths sink into the banality of communication. The young spouses Martins do the same, according to the psychology of their age. The former have senile wisdom. The latter, a childhood vitality. In time (non)communication deepens, meanings falling away from words, until they abandon them altogether or deliver them to an enunciative anamnesis. Meaning, being genetically absent, looks for a fictional ontological identity in a total slippage. The new contexts generated by such a type of enunciation create rhetorical spaces of communication, unnaturally proliferating, often ending, as we have seen, in a play of the logocratic massacre, broken by the commandments – the instances – of the enunciation. Characters produce their exchanges automatically, at an ever-increasing pace.

He also defined the social and political context in identical terms. He also accepted the Yugoslav model. He found it to be a junction. “Yugoslavia can play the role of a contact point.” It is not in vain to say: Historia magistra vitae! History (reality, context) dictates ways of thinking, too little retrospectively, vaguely projective, in a transient, amorphous, and (in)formal present. In this novel, the author, known especially as a poet and rhetorician, turns out to be a prose writer with remarkable qualities, such as narrative strategy and stylistic refinement. The book is the narrative of an ordinary woman’s tragic destiny, constrained to take on an unusual attitude on being faced with an out-of-the-common event: the popular uprising of December 1989. The jump from a banal everyday life into a challenging history projects the heroine into an incoherent future, condensed into a present whose energies escape existential stereotyping. Transforming the contradictory relationship between the individual and history into an unexpected alliance between an altered individual and a different history is the underground mechanism moving individuals unknown among themselves but willing to vehemently challenge a brutal reality under the flame of an ideal to be defined.

A confession and a meditation on the Jewish environment in Romania after the Second World War, starting from the author’s personal experience and biography, currently a lecturer at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Centred on an interview with the young philosopher Sandu Frunza, from the University of Cluj, the book reconstructs the life of Jews from Iasi (the author’s hometown), the author’s postwar adolescence during the Stalinist period, dilemmas and reflection stimulated by the options of the Hebrew community in Romania under the post-war conditions, having to choose between integration into the Romanian social and intellectual life marked by the temptation of communist perversion, or, or the alternative of settling in Israel. A significant part of the book focuses on the evolution of those Jewish intellectuals who left Romania during the Ceaușescu period, the difficulties and the drama of adapting to a new cultural environment as well as the complex relationship with the environment and the culture in which they had grown up. The volume represents the point of completion of some previous concerns of the author in the field of semiotics and stylistics through studies and essays devoted mainly to Romanian poetry along its history. Without ignoring the average creators who are important because they give expression to continuity, the critic is trying to explain, with instruments provided by the progress made by the humanities in the last half-century, the “mystery” that transforms speech into poetic language. The great national poets, from Mihai Eminescu to Nichita Stanescu, are discussed, revealing the characteristics of each of them, whereby the very essence of poeticity is defined.
The experimental narrative model is born as a reaction to an exhausted tradition, that has run out of its innovative valences. After a long reflection of the world in all its complexity, the writer intuited his limits, realizing that he is not a demiurge in the world of the imaginary, and that, from the old perspective, he has nothing new to say.

A Dictionary of Eminescu’s “Hyperion” is the first lexicographic work devoted to a single Romanian literary work, an”arch-text “ (integral poetic text, in an original concept and realization) consisting of definitive form, versions and variants. The early versions are not the Eminescian poetic language distilled, assumed by the author through by publishing in his lifetime, but the language of the poet Mihai Eminescu, as the manuscripts show, in an attempt to give it the ideal form; many lyrics not only rise to the value of the poetry published during his lifetime but often overpass it. These unfinished versions and variants contain a very rich and interesting lexicon. The dictionary attempts to present the poetic creation from the perspective of the lexicon, the options of creative individuality out of the material offered by the natural language; at the same time, within understandable limits, there is an attempt to enter into a certain imaginary universe, built through poetic language.

The troublesome problem of Eminescu’s Hyperion includes the emotion of discovering his genesis in his reception. From the point of view of the stages of creation, Hyperion had a destiny as distinct as the tumultuous evolution of its exegesis, which for 120 years has been approaching from different perspectives the mystery of this seductive poem. Identifying and recovering for the cultural thesaurus of the manuscript variants of the poem also has a history that is still that deserves to be continued.

The workshop for studying poetic expression in avatars or variants within a version is displayed on parallel columns. In this phase of his work, in each version, Eminescu did not necessarily meditate on the perfection of the verse, but focused on the “poetic idea”, which is the “soul”, as the poet says. Subsequent releases, from one version to the next, show, in addition to the continuity of creation, the meanders, the innovations of farfetched poetic ideas, and another process, that of stylistic refining. The intention behind our edition is to cast light on Eminescu’s labor on a version, facilitating the pursuit of variants with transformations, spontaneous transformations or return to earlier forms.” (Rodica Marian)

The Daily Shocks is the result of in-depth studies undertaken by the author in the field of contemporary life styles, in Romania, but also in other parts of the world. The author's research has been intensive especially during the last ten years. The basis of these texts is, first of all, the author's interdisciplinary weekly expositions on “Cultural Temptations” broadcast from Radio România Cultural. Obviously, a long way has been taken in the transformation of radio “pills” into a volume of cohesive, thematically structured and stylistically revised essays. Out of the rich contents, we mention: the daily shocks; the losses involved in adaptation; how they switched mobile phones to the world; street civilization (yesterday and today); culture on the bus; at the library, through libraries; at the market, while queuing, at the doctor’s; on a journey, on voyages; through large and small cities; about voyagers, about tips; weddings, baptisms, funerals... The book is written in a simple, accessible and playful style and addresses specialists in social history, anthropology, mass psychology, social reform, and the common readers in general.

An enlightening panorama of Romanian poetry, the files of a critic and poet who has archived here critical texts published along the years in Contemporanul, Luceafărul, Ramuri and others.
Europe’s unity is today a dream, utopia and reality. Napoleon was thinking of a political unit. Goethe – of a cultural unit. Romanians too shaped a united Europe model: Stephen the Great tried to achieve communion under the sign of Christianity. Eminescu spoke in 1870 about the necessity of a European Spiritual League that would harmonize the special interests, that is, the national ones, with the general-continental ones. Noica saw it under the sign of a unit / variety value model. Marin Sorescu wrote about the Romanians’ capacity for returning home from the European meridians. Acad. Mihai Cimpoi’s book is a reflexion on this different Romanian modelling of Europe at the time of integration.

From the Author’s notebooks (Closed Time), consistently written down since 1979 (brought up to date, whose bulk is the time line of a prospective geologist campaigns in the various quarters of the country), the remarks on aspects of literary life as such could not be missing. Scenes, portraits, dialogues, meetings with writers, fine artists, actors, musicians, and other contributors to cultural life are recorded in the Scenes of Literary Life. Several edifying fragments on this theme have already appeared in the Arges and Oglinda literara magazines, under the same title, Scenes of Literary Life, but also under other headings in Romania literara (“Sketchy Portrait of Mircea Ciobanu”), in Luceafărul (Live Number 13), in Ziua literară (We Were Pushed to the Edge…). Worth noting are the accounts of the constraints imposed by the relentless censorship and the numerous stratagems whereby writers sought to obtain “the OK for print” and “the OK for dissemination”, in the atmosphere of uncertainty in which the activity of artists in communism was carried out. The reader will also catch a glimpse of the author’s own workshop at the time when he worked on the manuscripts of The Bet, The Inner Court, The Stone Trap, which appeared in those years, as well as on texts that remained unpublished at that time. In these notebooks, there are, as expected, references to his own work, edited or unpublished at that time, but also to the works of colleagues of his generation or of the classics.

The Authors and Books is a collection of prefaces, afterwords, introductory or self-standing papers written over several decades by Professor Ion Ianoşi, revised and improved for the current edition. The book is published in three volumes, with the following subtitles: Western Cultures, Russian Culture, Romanian Culture. Volume I, Western Cultures, includes 15 studies, organized in three parts. Part 1 deals with six classical writers and some important Romanian works of the twentieth century. Part 2 analyzes six distinct writings by iconic thinkers from the 19th and 20th centuries. Part 3 presents the overall work of some philosophers. Ianosi glosses on Italo Svevo, Franz Kafka, Robert Musil; Heinrich Heine, Friedrich Nietzsche, Martin Heidegger most of them writing in German. The present volume appears as a follow-up Professor Ion Ianoşi’s monographs: the first ones, about Thomas Mann and Hegel, the second – about Dostoevsky and Tolstoy, the third one – about Constantin Noica. A lifetime project of highlighting foreranking figures from the German, Russian and Romanian literature and philosophy of the last centuries is thus being completed.

Portuguese Nostalgias is a volume of essays on a number of representative contributors to the vast Portuguese literature. The selection includes Luis de Camoes, Mariana Alcoforado, Fernando Pessoa, José Saramago and Antonio Lobo Antunes. From baroque fervour to melancholy, from pathetic outbursts to nostalgic composure, the trajectory of the argument retrieves the tension of a particular kind of sensitivity turning, according to Camoes', “its back to the earth and its face to the sea.” The approach is coloured by the use of rhetorical figures and devices which characterises the lit-crit genre.

Este o carte despre clasicii români creatori de valori universale și despre raporturile literaturii române cu alte literaturi europene, inclusiv cu cea rusă. La „frontiera” dintre aceste două literaturi și culturi au apărut personalități marcante, precum Nicolae Milescu Spătaru, Dimitrie Cantemir, Antioh Cantemir. Rădăcini genealogice românești (și subiecte basarabene), după cum s-a dovedit documentar, are Gogol. Despre aceste intersecții, rădăcini, paralelisme vorbește cartea acad. Mihai Cimpoi.

This book about Emil Cioran is a fascinating portrait of the thinker, as it emerges against the background of his works, out of his own testimonies, diaries, daily notebooks, interviews and correspondence with his family or close friends. It reconstructs the profile of a man and an anxious writer, deeply involved in the drama of his country and of mankind struck by the conflagrations of the last century, which disrupted not only the destinies of many individuals but of entire peoples. The reflections threading these confessions of the philosopher in Paris help the understanding of a profound intellectual consciousness, as well as of the serious existential problems faced by the contemporary age.

“Looking at the order in which I wanted to present the somewhat autonomous sections of the book, I hesitated for a long time to decide on the least obvious, initially... Logically, On the metaphysical threshold it ought to have prevailed. I preferred directions and stylistic associations, whose opening, “socialist realism”, plunges the reader into a Stalinist era in the early 50’s. Next come: language, artistic consciousness, poetic arts, then, the materiality of the world, reverie of the far off, love, and, finally, “On the Metaphysical Threshold”. Such an arrangement offers the peculiarity to represent a gradual departure from what the communist regime would have liked to do with Romanian poetry, on the way back to its eternal preoccupations and high interrogations.” (Ilie Constantin)

Annoyed by a lady who was the fashion columnist of a New York newspaper and who asked him about his favourite object in nature, Mark Twain is reported to have answered in his characteristic manner: “A beautiful Mute!” Journalist, translator, author of books, Irina Airinei meets only one of the conditions. Being an academic, a doctor in philology, teaching courses, chairing discussion classes, preparing students, she cannot be mute. Moreover, she is a press and radio journalist. Nevertheless, reading her interviews with personalities from almost every field, one realizes that, far from being silent, Irina Airinei has a great quality: she knows not only to ask, but also to listen. She is perfectly aware that the role of the reporter, beyond discovering people with interesting lives and personalities, is not to make himself remarked through “smart” questions gratifying his narcissistic propensities, but on the contrary, to approach thinterlocutor with discretion, trying to get out of the latter’s mind and soul everything that is more significant and more interesting. The fact is people who are born to see do not like to talk about themselves. Many of his Airinei’s interviews resemble an archaeologist’s work who is trying to dig up with care and delicacy the beauty hidden in the interlocutor’s self, retrieving from words something that perhaps, would never have been said. In the pages of this book, I present the general situation in the “Paradise of the West” and of the Romanian immigrant who comes over from my privileged position of both private person and journalist. Most of those who came in the period of “the Romanian transition”, but also a good part of the others, have been considered, especially in Germany, as only fit for unskilled labour, at the bottom of the social ladder (…) Romania is reputed in the West mainly for its “orphaned children, thieves and corruption “! At the same time I managed to maintain the necessary distance from the ones “back home”, and by returning to my country of origin once a year, by reading the papers and by a daily correspondence with many friends and acquaintances, I have manage to maintain a viable link to the everyday reality here. I wholeheartedly want to demonstrate to the Romanians what special values and qualities they have, which have often been denied from an excess of self-abasement or an inexplicable (self-) humiliation and exorcisms in front of often denied of the West. The idea of death’s inevitability casts a shadow on human life, turning it into a period of preparation for death, or otherwise, in a period of slow psychological break down. There are people who attach great importance to all of the commandments and practices of death and funeral, respecting them scrupulously. They even have the impression that in this way they are preparing for their own death, understanding that such an attitude towards death is also expected from those who will remain alive after death. But we will take another way, much safer, and we invite you to follow us. We intend to find out everything about death, the gradual demise, and the possibility of there being another life beyond the grave. On the basis of such knowledge, we will contribute to an increase in morale. The calm and balanced approach to the issue of death, the reduction of anxiety and fear through individual fruitful labor for the good of the community – here are safe ways to prevent neurotic disorders, manifestations of extremly aggressive egoism, as well as other pathological, destructive phenomena that can often be identified in people’s lives.

Social psychology is a complex and interesting field of present-day concern. In order to understand the complexity and variety of the psychosocial phenomena and processes studied, it is necessary to know the special textbooks and materials that relate to different scientific trends and which develop their content differently. The advantage of this handbook is that, firstly, the cardinal problems of social psychology are rigorously dealt with here. Secondly, the general characteristic of its basic notions and phenomena are presented, which derive from the circumstances of people belonging to different social groups and their integration within them. The information in the manual is provided in such a way that no contradictions occur in the process of acquiring a great deal of knowledge. In addition, the interrogating question-response form of the material allows, on the one hand, for the better assimilation of the particularities of the numerous phenomena and psychosocial processes and, on the other hand, it corresponds to the logic and the content of the answers to the questions of the exam in the discipline of Social Psychology. This textbook addresses students and PhD candidates from the faculties of psychology and sociology in higher education institutions, those who study to specialize in leadership, management, communication with society, advertising, as well as all those interested in social psychology.

The present volume in “One Hundred” Series is dedicated to an absorbing and vast theme – the history of the rise of mankind’s religious beliefs. Our book will allow the reader to understand the heterogeneity and varied manifestations of different currents of thought, sentiment, and religious life. The principles we have followed in conceiving it are in no way subject to certain religious preferences. Therefore, the fact that half of the figures presented are those of Christian figures is due only to the mentality of our potential readers, traditionally oriented towards European Christian culture. The problem we have been discussing can be formulated as follows: the representation of the history of Christianity against the background of other religions of the world. We have spoken the word “prophets” in the broadest possible sense. Of course, this word is used primarily to designate “founders of religions” (Jesus Christ, Buddha, Mahomed, Moses, Nanaka, Zarathustra and others) and also theologians (Nagarjuna, Ali-Gazali, St. Augustine, Gregory the Theologian, Maksim the Confessor and others).

What does mass panic mean? What frightens us most of all? How can panic be transformed into a manipulation tool? How do rumors work on us, and how can we turn the “rumor industry” into an effective mechanism that will support us, help us, serve us? Mechanisms of mass spontaneous behaviour served as an early object lesson for social and political psychology. In time, however, in our country, this object was moved to the periphery of the mentioned disciplines, becoming almost exotic. Mass manipulation strategies, the rumor industry are used as effective mechanisms by politicians to achieve thir goal – political manipulation. The author of the treaty is a professor of social and political psychology. He worked as a lecturer, practitioner and counselor psychologist in Russia, the CIS countries, Latin America, Europe and the Near East. The rich experience of...

The problem of money is known to all the inhabitants of this planet. Both those who have money and those who miss it are confronted with it. The core of this issue is not so much money but our attitude to it. Even if a man has enough money, the constant fear of losing it, being extorted, robbed, punished, etc. does not allow him to be happy, so he has to clarify his situation. Happiness, in fact, is not just what surrounds us, but our attitude to what lies near us. [...] The basis of this book is the postulate that thought is the most important thing in our lives. It is known that in the beginning was the idea about what this world should be like and only afterwards has the world become as we know it. Our thoughts and ideas are material. How do we understand and believe this? We always strive for the best, but we do not always get it. It is because of his own thoughts that man is so hard to be happy, healthy and rich. Man knew the apple before other fruit. In the beginning the apple was grown in Middle Asia and the Caucasus, from where it later spread to Palestine and Egypt, then to ancient Greece, Rome, and further on, in its triumphal march, to other countries and to other continents.
The story goes that apples have a miraculous effect (the story of apples that nourish you), and not by chance. The useful and healing qualities of apples are numerous. We refer to the basic ones: the book is dedicated not to apples but to apple vinegar. Let us not forget, however, that all the useful substances in vinegar are made from apples. The apple is a fruit... with a history. The first apple, as we know, was tasted by Eve – offered to her by the serpent! In the mythology of ancient Greece, the apple was the fruit that envenomed the gods against one another. Today, the apple is one of the most miraculous fruits that can keep you young!

Four Blood Types – four secrets of life Success is the continuation of a tremendously popular theme nowadays, namely that of a healthy lifestyle. Before we start talking about how we live, to live well (with emphasis where you like), let me start by asking you a question: What is health, actually? When we feel for the first time our own body protesting – blood pressure fall, radial affections, a chronic fatigue syndrome – we really wonder: but how come all this? Questions are endless: where have the enthusiasm and the love of life gone, where can we still find power for new things, why does any fun create more problems than satisfaction? There is only one answer. You are simply exhausted and the situation will not change unless you take it seriously.

The immense success of this book
Published in three editions, has encouraged us to return to a thrilling theme, namely the relationship between men and women. This book contains our practical experience for twelve years. In the script centred on the permanent rivalry among people, there are two roles. The first role –the manipulators. The second role – those who are manipulated. Those who lose in this war fuelled by rivalry come out empty-handed. They are abandoned by husbands, wives, lovers... Those who control the strategy of the struggle between rivals effectively use the methods of sentimental manipulation and are successful. This book is a good guide in this respect. Psychological techniques and tests will help you assess your possibilities, forecast your future, while the concrete tips will teach you how to fend off the rivals’ blows.

The researcher’s focus is mainly on the Romanian culture of the 19th century. Neither are, however, contemporary aspects overlooked. The book – written in a lively, vibrant style, with an exact and melodious phrase, shining like the blade of the Damscene Sword – is intended for students, academics, as well as a wide audience.

Much, perhaps even the most consistent and interesting part of the dissidence or resistance of the Romanian writers in their relations with the communist power lies in the archives: the Archives of Security, the National Archives, the Archives of the Executive Political Committee of C.C. the Archives of the Council of Culture and Socialist Education, archives and documents of the Press and Prints Directorate, etc. All these archives are packed up with ocuments of resistance. Romanian writers, for the most part, have earned a celebrity in these quarters of the world for writing letters. In Caragiale’s world, the tradition of filing conflicts is common practice... The book is a collection of documents, sometimes, extremely uncomfortable, incendiary.

What would be life in society like without a code of good manners?
You can appropriate an appreciable amount of knowledge, earn the most prestigious diplomas, you can visit all continents and yet stay an anonymous traveller unless you take with you in your luggage the only passport that opens borders and hearts: the manual of good manners. It is impossible to make a list of the rules of etiquette. But thinking deeper, they are revealed to be based on two essential grounds on which all others also rely. To know them is to have the key to finding, quasi-instinctively, in all or almost all circumstances, the solution to a new situation.

A fascinating show of femininity, death and other eternal themes is the latest book of the prominent essayist, historian and literary critic, Irina Petras, whom Marin Mincu dubbed our most “male” critic. “The approach is a way of brining death, your own death, as object lesson under a magnifying glass, to keep it deliberately there, day by day, watching it in your vicinity, so that it stimulates you to be more determined in spirit, to invest all your energy in whatever you undertake to do, with your whole being, one of the limits of which is the daily death, to reshape, while feeling the touch of death, your self and to apply yourself to the creative work that overcomes death. Do not get used to the vicinity of death, improve your efficiency, despite the tragic consciousness of human finitude – here is the touchstone, here is the capital test in which many failed. Those who passed it are, to Irina Petras, a worthy object of study, which, being researched with the acrimony of a collector, benefiting by considerable experience in the field, is placed in a gallery of mirrors. Seeing the reflexion of one’s own universe, fears, anguish, concerns, will the individual agree, in the spirit of fair play, but also from a subtle, refined blend of intellectual sadomasochism, to submit himself to the test: will his bosom bear the pressure? Will he know how to answer the questions? Or to resist? Well, the sacred monsters... they did resist, describing how they clung to the edge of the abyss, into which they saw their own faces, contemplated by someone else... “(Aura Christi)

“The relationships among words lends her poems metaphysical connotations against the background of an enigmatic music of quietude and silence, each written word having its own life and destiny (as in the poems of Uruguayan Delmira Agustini), embroidering mysterious associations hard to translate into Romanian, which caused me to let them fly alone, often quoting those for which I did not find a correspondent in my poor dictionary of synonyms.

The poems of Alina Beiu-Deşliu have a density and a dramatism that contrast with the usual patterns of femininity, being loaded with a tense lyricism that often explodes with the charm of immediate spontaneity, sometimes with the delicacy and fragility of dissimulations, which, by an inexplicable algorithm, reveals rather than cover the poetic message, creating an atmosphere of incomprehensible filigree at the first reading, but gradually clearing up and emerging in its whole splendour, forcing the reader to wonder, finally, whether the loneliness of the poet is mere isolation or a form of defense of his liberty gained through suffering.” (Valeriu Cuşner)

A novel of murder, debauchery and psychotic eroticism, ending up – in the Stoics’ style – in a suicide, treated as a deadly fulfillment. A dark novel, with guilty people lost in the guts of amorality, with incestuous and holy brothers defeated by the deaths of their loved ones, chaunting, in spite of it, out of the underworld of dark suffering, the will to power, the will to believe in a decayed world, spiralling down in the abyss of an endless decline.

A tour de force this novel, this epic poem about existence and death, faith and life, betrayal and love.

A genuine montagne russe, whose archetypal theme is the master-apprentice relationship, explicitl revisited from the great novelistic tradition of the golden age of Russian literature.

“[…] the reader in love with twists of plot, action, will follow the breath-taking epic trajectory in which one hates, loves, kills, dies, incorporating incest, treason, things to be retold, in amazement, out of “traumatic” curiosity. […] Night Vultures is, also in its third and last but one volume, an ambitious bildungsroman with great and excellent sequences of the complicated master / disciple relationship; the need for autonomy being as acutely felt as that of belonging – the young man being harassed alike by disturbing calls of his unfinished being and by the need to move on secure trails; about art as modus vivendi, about auroral and crepuscular, about morality and its words, about blood ties and thoughts, always impenetrable. Against the backdrop of a tense, thrilling intrigue that the reader will discover with the delight of the over of stories, Aura Christi’s Big Games are once again overwhelming.” (Irina Petras)

“Is Leopardi a pessimistic poet, as tradition has it? No. Not from our perspective today, when he appears to have been more of a tragic poet, plumbing into fundamental existential categories. It was not death in itself that scared Leopardi, but dying, that is, its processual manifestation. Likewise, Leopardi’s life is living. Their unfolding is reversed: life (living) is in retrospect, while the experience of death (dying) is a perspective. This ontological inversion is the basis of Leopardi’s Mythopoetics. The book constructs a modern and postmodern Leopardi, an intercultural and multicultural spirit looking ahead to European integration.

This portrait is doubled up by the Odyssey of Leopardi’s reception in the Romanian cultural space, as a pattern of archetypal lyricism, along with Eminescu.” (Mihai Cimpoi

Why, we may wonder, had Gratian Porumb allowed the man whom he despised this deed, this serious act of injustice? We do not know, we shrug our shoulders, looking to the left, looking to the right, but nowhere is there any help, any answer. All that is left to us then is guess work: was it that, in the imagination stirred by the new and strange adventure of the young man, his friend Bizonius had to “descend” into the “other world” which, ha, ha, is still our world, the world of “the unseen”? Oh, no, they are not invisible except for the simple reason that we remove them from our paths and hide them away, “shut them up” in their undergrounds called either dungeons, or madhouses? However, Gratian believed that the “little priest” had already walked in the “underground of the madmen,” and was now to go up to the others, the misunderstood and “punished” ones, who also had the right to meet Him, just as he, the living and understanding man – although, as we have seen, he did not “abuse” his understanding, made no effort to “understand,” but rather to hear, to see, to stand beside, to be, that is, to share the food of his time with us, to be “with us” – just as “he” had the “right” to be with “them”. Who knows? (Nicholas Breban)

“Parodicul nu este doar unul dintre modurile comice; el este rezultatul variatelor încercări pe care literatura le face spre a se reinnoi prin autonegare. Asumându-și acest rol, literatura parodică are luciditatea de a-și etala mecanismul auto-producerii, analizându-și exagerările, dar și constitutivele convenții. Această întoarcere spre literaritatea literaturii pe care mizează orice demers parodic este camuflată prin aparența orientare spre diferiți autori, texte sau stiluri. Orice parodist este, simultan, explorator prin textele altora, dar și autorul ce-și analizează lucid teritoriul propriului text. Una dintre aceste două dimensiuni poate fi dominantă într-o parodie, oscilațiile fiind generate atât de parodist, cât și de contextul estetic căruia acesta îl aparține. Dacă, în mod normal, principiile critice urmează dezvoltările formelor literare, discursul parodic este un discurs critic conștient deghizat în forma literară sau un discurs literar cu finalitate critică. Vorbim de parodia studiată estetic și nu de parodia ca simplă deformare, comisă din ignoranță.”

O fenomenologie a parodicului din Evul Mediu, epoca modernă și postmodernă, această carte oferă și analiza parodicului în operele unor scriitori ca Urmuz, Caragiale, Cărtărescu ș.a.

The edition is structured in several chapters, such as “Memories from Childhood and Youth”, “Cultural, Didactic and Political Memories”, including, among others, his exchange of letters with Titu Maiorescu, conferences and courses delivered in Vienna, Paris, Geneva, Prague, Oslo and Brussels. “Petrovici had a fractured life. At one time, he climbed up to the Everest of performance and public recognition, from where, when history was plagued by an apocalyptic ideology, he collapsed into the abyss of despair, a prey to all sorts of silly and insane persecutions. For a long time, he deceived himself seeking the comfort of philosophy, as he had learned from the ancients, but he broke down again seeing it reduced to the status of an ideological surrogate. Should he, after looking at the world through the opening of Plato’s cave, have to look at it from prison bars? The new times had found him totally unprepared. His voice, that had been heard in university lecture halls, in the Chamber of Parliament, at the Academy, during some glorious international meetings, was for many decades muted.” (Ionel Necula)

An exceptional book of dialogues with Ana Blandiana, Nicolae Breban, Augustin Buzura, Ion Ianosi, Gabriela Melinescu, Irina Petras, Dumitru Radu Popa, Alex Stefanescu and Ion Vianu. A disguised manual of history, written by the well-known writer (novelist, poet and essayist) Aura Christi, based on the testimonies of foreranking personalities in culture, possible European models, who – in the surrogate, endless transition – choose again and again the vocation of writer, remaining – impartial and careful witnesses – always in the forefront. An extremely dense book, of present interest, a fragment of a possible history of mentalities. “This book was born out of the need for friendship; has been gradually integrated within my sometimes catastrophic rhythms.. The interlocutors chose me, I searched them, tried to “tease” them with questions, the themes of the conversations converging, naturally, to a range of concerns that unite us more than they separate us. Whether I was talking to Ion Ianosi, Nicolae Breban, Ana Blandiana, Augustin Buzura, or to some other interlocutor, I wanted to find out – using as an instrument and sometimes as a weapon (rhetorical, of course) good questions; some of these, yes, naive, awkward, but live, always spirited! – how did each of them survive, how did they manage to shape their destiny, how did they manage to be, to remain themselves and not to break down, as each succeeded in not giving up on the fight for himself and for Romanian culture?
Some of the characters in this book – if we accept that each writer is a character and literature is a single unique book – I would like to believe that I have befriended, discovering them, rediscovering them every time; I like to think that each of us, almost every one of my guests – in one way or another – has marked me, has made me reapply in another way to literature, reading, books, to see some other things whose weighty nature I had not deemed, or – and more importantly! – helped (sometimes, without knowing!) me to stay the same, that is, to not change. Often, looking for the presence of writers, we are actually looking for a quality which my dark, tortured self finds it difficult to attain: serenity. Besides… I was looking for people of living letters, writers in flesh and bones – as I was saying in my teens, and, behold, I’m saying that even at the age of forty – who are not alien to the cult of friendship, the cult of vocation, the cult of well-done work, “rounded-up” work, as a character in one of my novels says. And then… yes, I will not keep it a secret, we are looking for what they call “complicity” in a post-Decembrist, twentieth-century cultural world, divided into groups, coteries, churches. The majority protagonists of this book are, of course, loners; and I was pleased to urge them to talk about the way they deal with solitude, life, literature, contemporaneity.” (Aura Christi)

An atypical, anniversary volume, lacking the usual encomiastical discourse, dedicated to a prominent personality of Romanian literature, C. V. Negoita, at the age of 70. “Premoderns believed in the seen and the unseen. Modernists came to the conclusion that there are many levels of reality. Postmodernists have discovered that each level has its logic. Between quantum physics and advanced computer science, based on cognitive science, there is a little known similarity. Both are governed by a logic different from that of everyday life, whose fundamental principles were carefully and comprehensively summed up by Aristotle. One of them says, one you cannot be both horse and donkey. The whole of mathematics and classical physics followed it. him. In a more formal language, we say that the classical logic “excludes the third”, lies in the middle, between the extremes, the only ones considered real. But a half-eaten apple is still an apple, and no one can tell how many hairs should be missing to declare a man bald. I handled these problems and came to the conclusion that the most important quality of natural language – vagueness – gives humans the astonishing possibility of describing complex universes with only a few tens of thousands of words. I refer especially to poets, because people in the street use fewer.” (Constantin Virgil Negoita)

Rilke, Tsvetaeva, Pasternak – an exceptional trinity, in the foreground of world literature; three lovers in spirit, three titans, who left us – leaving behind an overwhelming work! – a vast, vivid and rich correspondence across the globe’s meridians. Correspondence of a rare density, letters that are as many statements in love for literature, which gives existence the chance of being walled in a textual destiny. Rilke, Tsvetaeva and Pasternak are also the authors of one of the most beautiful “love stories” in the history of world literature. Every line of their letters shrieks, sighs, glows under the banner of the three exemplary destinies, running under the lucky sign – despite everything! – of a dark mystery and maybe under the Leaden Sign of tragedy. Sick, Rilke died at the end of one year of exchanging letters with Marina and Boris. Two and a half decades later Marina committed suicide, sharing the destiny of Esenin and Mayakovsky. Finally, the author of My Sister – Life will live in bleak loneliness and isolation....

This epistolary novel is a great gift to Romanian literature made by the great scholars Janina Ianoși and Ion Ianoși – the last apostles of a spiritual Europe. (Aura Christi)

“Young anthropologist, take courage! The time of the Socratic man has passed definitively, and, with him, the time of his Cartesian, Kantian, Positive, or Marxian grandchildren. The illusory cloth of the falsified history of ideas is breaking apart, the ridiculous and treacherous galloping of the Extreme West is smoother, and the last disappointment may very well be the prelude to a new – “and always the same” – immemorial “humanism,” that of an eternal definition, thus endless, of man within the limits of his destiny, of his “nature”, of his condition. The sun rises not above ridiculous “magicians,” but above Olympus, where, as Heraclitus says, “gods are immortal men, while men are mortal gods.” It is this part of eternity, that still has something to do with gods and with people, that needs to be elucidated.” The book is addressed to a broad readership.

An hour and a half left for us. The trepidation is becoming stronger... We are told not to walk up and down the aisle and to fasten the seat belts. I realize what can happen: a terrorist, a cyclone, an accident or some Bermuda... Oh, God forbid! I comply and keep watching the film, ignoring and forgetting the danger, like everyone else around me. It’s getting dark slowly. I can’t wait to get to destination... To finally see New York! The last time I was afraid of death... In fact, not of death, but of the terror and the physical torture of our aberrant system! Why should I be afraid of death? A simple prolongation of life. A trivial face of impartiality. Death?! An incomplete life of loneliness...

The textualized ego is driven by the temptation to dig up infinitely into the etheric layers of the self, in search of self-expression, the artist’s ego, the unreal ego, the fantasy ego, the ego accompanied by the sweet-terrifying-necessary spectres [...]

We are deceived by our own birth. Later we are deceived by our pacifier. We get used to this. That is why, in every man, there is a potential for deception. Delusion is coded in man from the very beginning. It helps us to survive! Therefore, deception is an inseparable phenomenon in our lives. You run into it everywhere: at home, at work, on the bus, on journeys. Even the most experienced psychologist, let alone a fortune teller or telepath, will not be able to secure you against the traps of lies. Therefore, what is written in this book is not at all true. There are only suggestions of how you can defend yourself, but nothing more. These suggestions are vital, however. Manual recommended to students of higher education with a humanistic or technical profile, PhD students and academics, as well as as informative material for individual study and improvement of one’s own psychological safety.
To simply learn some manipulation methods won’t do. You will admit that life and love are more refined than the most delicate refinements. Consequently, our advice is that you should start with yourself. You only know your nature, the main traits of your character, of your temperament. In order to influence people without resorting to coercion, certain behaviors are required. Would you like to find out how this helps you in life? And especially as far as relationships with men are concerned?

Ion Ianoşi, Dostoevsky. The Tragedy of the Underground
Dostoievski. Tragedia subteranei

This monumental monograph dedicated to one of the greatest novelists of the world has the advantage of summing up much of the bibliography written on the work of the giant who signed, among others, the masterpiece Crime and Punishment. Ion Ianosi places the “action”, that is, the epic thread of the research undertaken within the context of the nineteenth century, so that the heroes of the literary life back then are coming back to life in provocatively vivid portraits.

“An undeniable masterpiece.” (Nicolae Breban)
The captivating story of a spiritual couple, Dostoevsky and Tolstoy: two titans who never met but read each other’s books, exchanged impressions through intermediaries, engaged (from a distance, an intriguing, incomprehensible one, since the two giants loved each other!) in a spirited dialogue, inscribed with golden letters in the history of world literature as one of its great mysteries.

An applied analysis of the work of one of the most controversial German thinkers, nicknamed the Sils-Maria hermit; an elaborate reading of Nietzsche’s way of approaching some difficult concepts, interpreted in a radical way: the superman, the eternal return of the same, Antichrist. This is an essay in the good and prestigious tradition of great authors commenting on the fundamental texts of mankind from a specific perspective.

A brilliant novel, a best-seller, thematizing the era of transition, with its controversial aspects. The writer goes against the wind, committing herself to writing a formation novel (bildungsroman) in the wake of great writers of the world, such as Goethe, Th. Mann, Nietzsche, Dostoevsky. This novel is the first volume of an epic cycle, entitled Night Vultures. Each novel in the sequel is a distinct epic construction.

I see in Aura Christi a representative of this integrated, transnational age, the fruit of a tree whose roots are in Bassarabia (formerly part of the Soviet Union, now the Republic of Moldova) and whose branches reach to Romania, a country which has been a member of the European Community since 2007. Her complex writing bears testimony to a dramatic personal and collective destiny. Aura Christi’s works bespeak a strong personality, of an aesthetic relevance that has got her into the present canon of Romanian literature.” (Marian Victor Buciu)

Aura Christi has found the language in which to cast experiences that seemed to lie beyond one’s capacity of discursive articulation: the lapse of humanity to the point where someone kills with his conscientious approval in the name of an idea, the gradual process whereby the man within man is replaced by a monster. It is not the statistics of crime – impressive as it is – that interests Aura Christi. She pours Nietzsche into Dostoevsky in order to make the anatomy of absolute Evil. The evil in the human heart. The titles of her books are telling in respect to their moral geography. Their paysage moralisé is The House in the Dark, The Sphere of the Cold, The Savage Circle.
the West, it was philosopher Nietzsche whose seminal ideas in the deconstruction of logocentrism were allowed to shape postmodernist epistemology. In Romania, it was the Nietzsche of demystified ethics that shaped two master minds of contemporary literature. Novelist Nicolae Breban chose the male Nietzsche of master souls and of the will to power. Aura Christi was attracted to the Nietzsche of aporia, the Nietzsche who, in Ecce Homo placed humanity under the double effigy of Christ and Dionysius. In Aura Christi’s words: “kindness ending in claws”... She is a novelist of the lapserian East in a portrait gallery that includes Ismail Kundera, Bashkin Shehu, or the Strugatski Brothers, because in all of them a nightmarish reality is cast into bits of humanity’s broken souls.” (Maria-Ana Tupan)

The author addresses the subject of surrender to evil which can, in various degrees, be blamed upon writers such as Celine, Eliade, Cioran, Knut Hamsun or Ezra Pound, Sartre, Aragon or Brecht. The conclusion is a subtle one, and stands to reason: a great writer – guilty in point of civic conduct – will always remain a great writer, irrespective of ideological contestation.

A fascinating discourse about one of the most famous and most appealing actors and directors, a figure wrapped up in scandalous stories whose atypical character he was, with his life interspersed with unexpected turns and often full of suspense, the backstage adventures of this philosopher on the stage and metaphysical buffoon of existence. The author was awarded the Prize of the Romanian Film Makers Union for this book.
The life of the great German thinker, nicknamed the hermit of Sils Maria, was full of splendour, but also of aspects less known to the common reader. Among them, there is the passion for music experienced by the author of The Gay Science and This Spoke Zarathustra, as well as the influential relationship and profound love for Richard Wagner and his wife, wonderful Cosima – who are vivid characters in this essayistic monograph, which includes letters exchanged by these sacred monsters of world culture, a correspondence which leaves the reader enlightened and emotionally satisfied.
